

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. MY HEALTH.

CHAPTER I.

BIGSBY MY BOY—RETALIATION—CHEERINESS—THE MOMPISONS — MENTAL MEM — AGATHA MOMPISON — DANIEL LAMBERT—A PICTURE—ANALYTICAL HISTORY—TORPIDITY—COMMENCING FAT MAN—MORE MENTAL MEMS—WINTON—HIS CLUB—AN INVITATION—VAGUE—MORE OF THIS.

MY health has often been proposed, and I've returned thanks for it—such as it is. Can't make out what's the matter with me. Bigsby, meeting me in the street, exclaims heartily—(just like Bigsby, by the way)—“Hallo, old fellow!”—(everyone's an “old fellow” with Bigsby, or, if not an “old fellow,” you're “his boy”)—“how deuced well you're looking!”

I reply, “Am I?” as if this was information coming from Bigsby, and look (I can't help it) as much as to say to him, “Bigsby, my boy”—(you fall at once into the habit of saying “My boy” when with Bigsby)—“You mustn't judge by appearances. The excitement of seeing you”—(I tumbled upon him round a corner ; he being, of course, the last man I'd expected to meet. Query : If Bigsby's the last, who was the first? Make a note of this for my Theory of Precognisances—“has made me look healthy, has called up the hectic flush, Bigsby ; but no ! I am not the robust creature you imagine me to be.”

I do not say this to Bigsby. I look it at him. I only reply, “Am I?” and retaliate upon him with, “So are you : never saw you looking better.”

“Why !” cries Bigsby (“cries !” I should say “shouts !” for wherever Bigsby meets you, so remarkably cheery is he—“cheery” is his own word—that he must shout at you if he likes you, and the more he likes you the louder he shouts—“Why, my boy”—(I knew I should be “his boy” directly)—“you're getting horrid stout?” And he throws himself back, in a sort of artistic manner, as if to get a good light on me, and bring out my points. Of course Mrs. Gore Mompison and her two daughters issue at this moment from Fortnum & Mason's—

Mem. “Sweets to the Sweet.” Good thing to say to the Mompisons when I meet them at a dinner-party, à propos of Fortnum's. Mustn't let Bigsby's shouting put it out of my head. This mem is a mental mem while Bigsby is shouting and I am raising my hat to the Mompisons.

They look astonished. At least Agatha Mompison does, and elevates her eyebrows. If I was asked, I should at this moment like to be seen to advantage ; but one can't be with Bigsby. “'Pon my word,” he says, still shouting, and sticking to his subject, “You're regularly running into fat.”

The Mompisons, all of them, hear this, and I can't help noticing their heads pushed forward sily, just to take a quiet glance at me from the carriage window, to see if I am "running to fat."

I wonder what they decide.

If I ever (again) meet Agatha, and we sit out a dance or two in retirement, and if I commence to talk to her from the depths of my heart, won't Bigsby's words recur to her mind suddenly (just as one suddenly thinks of funny things in church), and won't she say to herself "He's running to fat"?

Bother Bigsby—at the same time bless Bigsby. The truth is unpleasant, but if it is the truth?

Yes, I think it is. Perhaps Daniel Lambert was once thin. Everybody must have a beginning; fat men must have a beginning. I remember smiling at an enormous man who showed me a picture of a slim young creature, "That, Sir," said he, "was I, years ago."

I own I did not believe him.

I see now it is possible. I am beginning to be fat. That's why I am melancholy, that's why I am out of spirits, that's why I sleep heavily, and that's why I can't get on with my scheme for my "Analytical History of Motion," which is to commence with the First Revolution of the Earth, and then take everything in its turn.

That's why—I see it now, hang and bless Bigsby!—that's why I've stuck at the same line of Chapter the Second on "Elementary Rotation," and have gazed at the paper day after day, torpidly unable to write a single paragraph, and feeling only inclined to scribble occasional mems for future work, and generally ending with scrawling idiotic figures with thin legs, no bodies, and large noses on the very sheets which ought to have been devoted to the highest scientific purposes.

Bigsby is right. I am, as it were, an infant Fat Man. There is such an academical existence as that of a "Commencing Bachelor." I don't know what it means, and it conveys no very distinct idea of a profession to my mind. But I see what a Commencing Fat Man is. I realise that.

Mental Mem to be acted upon immediately. To go home and try all my clothes on. Give attention to waistcoats, &c. Particularly "&c."

I have parted from Bigsby, and have taken my way, by bye-streets to my Club. I will not appear in the Park; I will avoid the haunts of men. I will be a hermit—a Commencing Fat Hermit.

No. I slap my forehead. I have it! * * * I will be thin. Take Fat by the forelock. "A stitch in time," &c., and so forth. * * * Stay! * * * Perhaps Bigsby's wrong. Perhaps it's only his fun. Having nothing particular to do, I'll call—no, I'll write to Bigsby, and ask him if it was only his fun.

At this moment Winton walks in.

Winton is sharp, short, and decisive, his hair curls crisply. His eyes are here, there, and everywhere. He rubs his hands briskly while talking, and smacks them with a sort of "flash" which a conjurer gives to a pack when he is going to show you the card you choose, when he delivers an oracular opinion.

Winton is a great hand at health. He never (so I believe) overeats, never overdrinks, never oversleeps, is always well, lives a good deal "about," as he calls it, which means that no one is ever certain as to his address. "The Club," says he, "will always find me;" and yet not once in twenty months will you find Winton at his Club.

However, here he is. He is brown, sunburnt, not an ounce of flesh too much upon him. I envy Winton as I salute him, and congratulate him on his health.

"Yes," he returns, "you ought to come with me"—(he never says where)—"and take regular exercise. Your sedentary work doesn't do. Go in for tennis, or riding, or a good stretch over the downs."

I say, "What downs?" expecting an invitation from him to his house somewhere by the sea. Pleasant.

"O," he replies, rubbing his hands, and chuckling, "Anywhere. You take a little place by the sea, and I'll come and stop with you, and put you through your paces." And he slaps his hands, and smiles amiably.

I must hear more of this.

N collecting the advice of my friends on this subject, I find it convenient to classify their opinions thus:—

1. To walk like old boots every day for three hours.—Simpson's Opinion.
2. That I ought to do gymnastics every morning for an hour, and go in for a turn with the gloves for two hours before dinner.—Muggeridge's Opinion.

Mem. Notion of the gloves not bad, if I could find a professor who would bind himself solemnly not to hit me on the nose. Somebody in great suffering once exclaimed, "All this to crush a worm!" When a sort of muscular buffer comes with a deadened blow on what the P. R. terms the "smeller," so that you feel that organ suddenly spread (as it were) over your face, and your eyes watering violently, then one is inclined to adopt the above, and cry, "All this to smash a nose!"

2nd Mem on this Subject. The punishment of the nose because the hands are fighting, is a specimen of uneven-handed justice where the innocent suffers for the guilty.

3. To go in for the Cold Water Cure.—Viddle's Idea.

4. To get change of scene. Run about everywhere.—Fluter's Idea, accompanied by a practical suggestion to the effect that, if I'll pay half his expenses, he'll travel with me anywhere.

Mem. Fluter's not a bad fellow ; and if no one else will go, Query, is he worth it? What's the proverb say? "Better to be alone than to pay half of another fellow's travelling expenses," or something to that effect.

5. Go and stay with Gilver in the North. He'll be delighted to see you.—Richard's Opinion.

Richard is a cousin of mine, and he thought I was going to propose coming to stop with him.

Various Opinions (all unprofessional). Go in for diet.—Cut off lunch.—Get up early.—Go to bed early.—Get up late.—Take hot baths only.—Take nothing but cold water.—Take a shower-bath before dinner.—Never take a shower-bath by any chance.—Walk before breakfast.—Never walk before breakfast, but immediately after.—Get the morning air.—Morning air worst thing for me : death in fact.—Never go out until 2 P.M.—Hunt.—On no account venture to hunt.—Take medicine every other day.—Rashest thing for me to take any medicine : play Old Gooseberry with me.—Live high.—Live low.—Walk.—Lie down.—Run.—Jump.—Shoot.—Box.—Drive.—Sing.—Dance.—Eat vegetables.—Never touch any green meat.—Take no pastry.—Take anything.—Never touch tea or coffee.—Never touch coffee : 'take tea.—Never touch either.—Take weak tea last thing at night.—Never at night, but first thing in the morning, &c., &c., &c.

I sit in and consider the matter. I go out and consider the matter. I am restless. I can't work. I feel depressed. Coming events begin to cast their shadows before me, and, on deflexion, I feel sure that I am getting fat.

Bigsby's awful words haunt me—"running to fat," just as weeds or strawberries spread out (awful simile !) and run to seed. It won't bear thinking of.

I've a headache. It suddenly comes on at the corner of Sackville Street, where my friend Mulfer lives. Mulfer ? Odd it never occurred to me till this moment that Mulfer is the rising young Practitioner of the day. I'll consult Mulfer. He'll advise me as a friend and as a medical man ; or, seeing that I know beforehand his advice will be gratis, the characters will be amalgamated, and he'll be my Medical Friend.

I tell him (he's delighted to see me in his little back study with a case of the brightest surgical instruments on the table, a picture of Doctor Somebody on the wall, and a bookcase full of professional literature) that I have not called in professionally (this will remove all delicacy on his part and mine about a fee, and reduce the affair to a mere friendly visit), but just to see him, and ask him how he is.

Mem. Not a bad idea for getting an opinion from a doctor. Call in and ask him how he is. Hint for conversation with doctor :—

Friend. How d'ye do? How are you ?

Doctor. Ah ! How d'ye do? How are you ?

Friend (seizes the opportunity for a "full and particular," and details all his symptoms). How am I? Ah, that's it, &c. (Here follow the complaints.)

I tell him how I am. I tell him how I have been. I tell him how my headache has just come on, taking me at the side of the nose, going up to the top of my head, round behind my ear, and down again to my jaw, until it seems to turn into a toothache.

I tell him that I am getting fat. I tell him that I feel generally speaking "anyhow."

"You want a regular change," says Mulfer. "Go away for six months at least."

After expressing this opinion, he looks at his watch, says he's rather pressed for time, will I excuse him? rings a bell, then there's a knock at the front door, then his mysterious man enters to ask "if he shall show Lord Aubr——"

Mulfer stops him in the middle of his indiscretion, and tells him, "Up-stairs."

"And Lady Court——" (his mysterious man begins again).

Once more Mulfer (who, I see, attends the aristocracy) stops him quickly, and tells him, "back room," then looks at me, as much as to say, "You see how busy I am."

I do see how busy he is, I thank him very much, promise to "let him see me again soon." He replies, "Do," but not heartily, and I show myself out into the dark passage, and into the arms of the mysterious servitor, who lets me open the front door for myself (I'm evidently not worth half-a-crowns for future interviews, and he sees it with a practised eye), while he ushers a lady out of the front room into the sanctum.

There are coroneted carriages about the door. Mulfer is getting on, and I've been taking up his time.

Mem (in pocket-book.) To ask Mulfer to dinner when I come back. At present, to take his advice, and go away, for change. Where?

I am melancholy. As I think of going away for change, I am depressed.

I will go and call on my Aunt. It's an odd thing that whenever I'm depressed I always feel I should like to go and call on my Aunt Henrietta, and I generally do.

The idea of calling on my Aunt when miserable, originated (I can distinctly trace it) in an ancient and laudable custom of my boyhood. The occasions of greatest depression to me, when a boy, were undoubtedly the days of my return to school, and these became to me "times of refreshing," as a lawyer might say, because I went the round of my relations in London, and made a collection to defray the expenses, or, as it were, encourage the performance, of my going back to school. I knew, as well as a street musician, or a country tramp, the houses that were good for anything, and also could reckon beforehand, to a shilling, how much they were good for.

My Aunt was uniformly one sovereign. I visited her, beaming, at half-past eleven, A.M., commencing my tour with her. We were delighted to see each other, she made inquiries about my progress at school, and fetched her purse out of her work-box; I meantime, delicately pretending not to know what was going on. Then, after stopping there a quarter of an hour, I rose to leave, and she pressed a sovereign into my hand, for which I used to thank her heartily and blushing, and then giving her a kiss (as a sort of set-off), bade her good-bye.

Thus it happens that, whenever I'm in as low spirits as I used to be on going-back days, I always instinctively turn towards my Aunt.

My Aunt Henrietta is of a sad temperament, and dresses (for no particular reason) something like a Lady Abbess, or, to give a better idea of her costume, as a Lady Abbess might appear in a brougham, and going out shopping in Regent Street.

"Well, my dear," she says, after hearing my statement of suffering, "I should say that quiet and repose would do all you want for you."

I assent.

"With, of course, a thorough change of scenery."

I assent again. I fancy she contemplates making me a handsome present (nothing like reviving good old customs), and paying my expenses for a continental trip.

"Change of scene," she continues, meditatively, "and change of people."

Certainly ; quite my views on the subject.

"You should have no anxiety or trouble for some time, for instance," she goes on, myself assenting to every particular ; "and so, I think——" (she's adding up what she's going to "come down with") "if you were to come down——" (ahem ! the coming down I'd expected from her) "with me to Ramsgate, you could"—in a burst of generosity—"stay there for a fortnight or three weeks."

I am very much obliged. I accept. Ramsgate is near Dover, Dover to Ostend, and so forth. A little diplomacy will manage it. Diplomacy says, "Cultivate your Aunt." I will.

We go to-morrow. The party consists of my Aunt, her maid (a nice young girl of-about fifty-three), a small King Charles (retained on the establishment for past services), and a melancholy turtle-dove in a wicker-cage. Our united ages amount to—but no matter ; I foresee quiet, rest, and irresponsibility.

On looking over my Mems I find that I had set down, "Call on Minsley about certain commissions in town." As I shan't have any time to see him to-morrow, it occurs to me, after finishing my packing, that I'll look him up (10.30 P.M.) to-night. Minsley has something to do with looking up old records in a State Paper Office, and is generally considered a rising young man of strict business habits.

I find Minsley at his Club. He has dined late with a friend, and they are the only persons in the large dining-room. I am announced, and shown in. I don't know the friend. They have two decanters on the table, one nearly empty, the other half full, and some legal-looking papers are lying between them.

Minsley and friend have either had quite as much as is good for them, or have been both fast asleep.

Both attempt to be excessively polite. The friend smiles and bows, and evidently would rise if he could only move his chair away from the table.

Minsley says, "Aha!" and looks at me as if trying to see me through a mist.

I am introduced to his friend (who tries to rise again, and is puzzled by his chair), whose name seems to be, as pronounced by Minsley, Mr. Wednesday.

He says, "Let me in'duce Mis' Wens'day," and omits my name entirely. Mr. Wensday smiles blandly, and in waving his hand (intending, I fancy, to motion me with the utmost politeness to a seat), upsets a wine-glass. At this they both laugh, though Wensday appears to be a little discomfited, and mutters something about "'ts not being worth mentioning." I seat myself, and am about to address Minsley, when I notice that he is suddenly dozing, while Wensday is still bowing to me, and smiling.

I observe to Minsley that if he's too sleepy to attend to business now, I'll write to him, as I shan't have time to call before leaving town.

He wakes up at the mention of business, and replies, "Certainly. I can 'tend. Go on." Then, by a sudden inspiration, "Take something." Whereupon Wensday, who is helping himself to claret (and pouring some on the law papers), "begs pardon, and hopes I'll join"—with which he knocks over his wine-glass, and looking angrily round, as if some one had jogged his elbow, says, "Wai'r, wine-glass to thisgen'man." Then he smiles upon me as before.

Whatever Minsley is, there is no doubt about Wensday's being very far gone.

I find out afterwards that his name is Middleborough, but that before I came in they'd been discussing something important to be done on Wednesday, and Minsley (so he says) had somehow got the word on his lips, and really was quite unaware he'd made the mistake.

Mem. This explanation comes to me by post days after.

I mention why I am forced to go away. My health. Wensday says, "By all means ; in a bumper," and is calling for another bottle of claret when I manage to make him understand that I am not proposing a toast. More smiles from Wensday. While this passage is occurring between us, Minsley goes beyond a doze, and fairly snores.

As it is improbable I shall get him to attend to any business (and mine being important and pecuniary, requires a clear head), I rise to go.

I leave Wensday—quite unable to get away from his chair, but polite to the last—smiling, bowing, and saying something indistinctly, "Bett'r stop—f'ish it"—(he means "finish it," it being the bottle)—and Minsley fast asleep, with his chin hiding his white tie.

Mem. Not a good time to call on Minsley as a man of business. Wonder what those law papers were about that they'd got on the table between them? Wonder when they got home, and how?

CHAPTER III.

DIFFICULTIES—CABMAN—LUGGAGE—MASTER GEORGE—DOD-DRIDGE AND DOVE—MY AUNT'S POCKET-HANDKERCHIEF—HIDE AND SEEK—IN THE TRAIN—"TELL ME, SHEPHERD" —OLD GUARD—PRIVATE CARRIAGE—NO SMOKE.

MY Aunt is of opinion that I shall be the better for my journey to Ramsgate: this she says before starting, at the Railway Station.

I never knew any two people so difficult to find as my Aunt and her maid, or any things so difficult to keep in one place as my Aunt's and her maid's packages.

Of course (after an altercation with the Cabman in consequence of the number of parcels outside, in which he has the best of it), I have to take their tickets and look after the luggage. It requires a considerable amount of "looking after." I ask them in the meantime to step into a waiting-room: from that moment I experience the greatest trouble in what I may term marshalling my forces.

After seeing the luggage labelled, and arranging for one porter to carry our wraps, rugs—we have as many as if we were going on an Arctic expedition—and umbrellas, and entrusting another porter with the turtle-dove in its wicker cage, I go in search of my Aunt.

Into one waiting-room—no. Somebody very like her, but that won't do.

Into another waiting-room—no. Odd. Perhaps the refreshment room—no. Ah, there's Doddridge, her maid, by the bookstall. Doddridge has known me from infancy, and calls me Master George. She is a trifle more cheerful than my Aunt, there being, perhaps, just one smile to choose between them. You never know when either of them is going to cry. There are some subjects of conversation which, if anybody touches upon ever so lightly, set them off one after the other, as if by mechanism. Doddridge's sorrow is the memory of her great-grandfather, whom she supported for years (she's a kind soul) until there was nothing left to support, except his loss, which appears to be still (and it happened twenty years ago at least), insupportable.

Mem (always to be borne in mind in talking with Doddridge). Never mention any great-grandfather. Ignore such a being.

My Aunt has a secret sorrow. There's the difficulty with her. No one can tell why she chooses to dress like a Lady Abbess (with modifications). No one can tell why she invariably retires for two hours during the afternoon, and will be at home to no one.

You can avoid the pit-fall of Doddridge's grief, but you can't do the same with my Aunt's. You may step down on it suddenly if you're treading (conversationally) ever so lightly, and then—squish!—out come the tears, not noisily, but with sufficient force to give you such a shock as you'd have if you'd pulled a shower-bath string, when you thought there was nothing in and the top turned out to be full.

You never knew of what subject to steer clear with her. And then, when she cries, it is most embarrassing; she weeps with her eyes wide open, not blinking for a second, and she never has a pocket handkerchief to hand when wanted. If my Aunt is up-stairs, her pocket-handkerchief is down-stairs, and vice versa.

I find Doddridge at the book-stall. Where is my Aunt? "Lor, Master George," says this excellent woman, "how should I know? What with the bustle, and the whistling, and things going about, I really can't see no one nowhere, and where your Aunt has gone, Master George, is a misery" (she means "mystery") "to me." I point to a waiting-room and tell her to go in there. She continues, "and then, Master George, there's poor Charlie (the King Charles, now in her arms, turning up his nose at me, and showing his teeth), I must take him with me in the carriage. Lor', if he was to go in the luggage place, or if I was to part company with him, Missus would never forgive me, for she says, just before you left us, says she,"—

—I pretend to see my Aunt in the distance and leave Doddridge. I find my Aunt at last, slowly walking up the Greenwich Train platform. I bring her back, and then go for Doddridge, in the waiting-room. Doddridge has vanished. I rush out, and to secure my Aunt, ask her to "wait there" (a seat under the clock) while I fetch Doddridge.

I come upon Doddridge in the refreshment-room, feeding the dog. We've only got five minutes—she can't find her purse. I pay—sandwich for dog. Now then, back to my Aunt.

No Aunt. Try for luggage. See Porter with turtle-dove, showing it to some other men. Don't see Porter with Arctic rugs.

On my return, followed by Porter and dove, who shan't quit me any more, I miss Doddridge, and, beginning to lose my temper, suddenly encounter my Aunt coming out of waiting-room.

"Oh," I exclaim, "here you are, at last."

[Mem. On consideration (reviewing the day from a diary point of view) this was not exactly the tone in which to address her. Must be gentle with my Aunt.]

Afraid I spoke roughly—shall I apologise? I see the tears gathering in her eye. Can't be brutal—can't say "only two minutes; no time to cry; come on; cry when we're in the train." What can I do?

Porter does it. Porter says, "Only two minutes more, Sir."

Then we hurry on. That is, the Porter hurries first to say we're coming; I hurry next, at only half the pace I could and should go if I were alone, and then comes my Aunt, whom at this moment, in my impetuosity (I am impetuous and hate missing a train) I should like either to carry down the platform, on a truck, at a run, or (with another fellow) to take both hands and pull her along, somewhat after the country-dance style of "up the middle and down again." I don't think this cruelly, but as much as to say (if I could say it to her), "You'll thank me for it when you're seated."

She is seated; half a minute more. She's in the carriage—so's the turtle-dove. Where's the other porter? and Doddridge? Good heavens! Doddridge!! and Charlie!—a quarter of a minute. Stout old Guard, with ruddy face, says, "Now then, Sir," intimating that I must get in and let him shut the door. I say, "Tell me have you seen—"

Quotation suggests itself—"Tell me, Shepherd (Guard of the Ramsgate train) have you seen my Doddridge pass this way?"

No. "With a dog?" shrieks my Aunt.

"Got a ticket for it, M'm?" asks Guard. My Aunt turns to me.

"Yes," I reply ; luckily I have, at least, I know I received one, but can't find it, or any of them, now, of course ; both the things. "Yes, and for the maid—"

Sharp Porter (suddenly). "Maid and little dog, I put 'em second."

He rushes (for sixpence) wildly along the platform, tugs at a door, lugs out Doddridge (who thinks it's something to do with the police or train on fire) and the dog, brings 'em along, I beckoning (having come out of the carriage again), my Aunt waving her handkerchief from the window, the old Guard looking at his watch, and then opening the door with "Now then, Miss"—Miss to Doddridge which means a shilling prospectively from me—I jump in, Doddridge is bundled in and falls somewhere as the signal is given, the engine shrieks, and we are off.

"O, Mum!" exclaims Doddridge, "the rugs and umbrellas!! They was put in with me, Mum, by the young man as showed me into the second-class, as I didn't know as Master George had took a first ticket for me, Mum, and I've left 'em there, Mum, in the 'urry. Whatever shall we do, Mum? There! I wouldn't ha' had that t'appen for fifty pound, Mum, I wouldn't."

I say, we shall get them on the first stoppage, and I wish we may.

Mem. What I am on all hands advised to get for My Health is, Quiet, Repose, and an absence of Responsibility.

First Stoppage. Old Guard (sounds like a Napoleonic title) looks in, brings rugs, &c. Joy of the party.

Old Guard informs us through the window, pleasantly, that he's going through with us. I reply that I am glad to hear it.

Mem. Politeness to a Guard, or from a Guard, costs something. Invariably.

Old Guard, still looking in, says with a knowing look, "All right, you'd like this carriage to yourselves"—I, my Aunt and Doddridge, aged fifty-three if a day—"so I'll do my best to keep it for you," with which he nods, winks, smiles and locks the door. Does he think we're a bridal party? two spoons and an old maid? or can he imagine that my Aunt wants to smoke?

Smoke! I should like a cigar now, while travelling. The time above all others. My Aunt hates it. Not to be thought of—or rather to be thought of as much as I like, but not to be tried on any account.

To put it (as it flashes across me) in a nautical form, "No smoking abaft my Aunt."

Mem. Absence of Worry is essential to My Health. I feel I shall worry myself about not being able to smoke, while I'm at my Aunt's.

N THE TRAIN. All three silent ; turtle-dove cooing ; melancholy noise. I feel inclined to say a lot of things, but don't. Must select my subjects carefully, or else they'll both cry.

Things I feel inclined to say, but don't—(keep'em for another time). The noise made by the train fits any tune (hum one and try it—hum another. Can do this when with musical friend, but not now ; keep it).

That we wriggle about a good deal in this train.

That time soon passes while travelling.

That Railway Travelling is superior to Coaching.

That it's delightful to get out of Town.

That the Country is looking very well.

Mem (to consider what I mean by this.) Whatever anyone else may mean, I find, on analysis, that my notion is, that the Country is different to Town ; that it is green ; that there are trees ; that there are fields ; that there are sheep and cows.

That it is impossible to make out the name of a station from listening to the Porters.

That we want a new Act requiring uniformity of pronunciation among Railway Porters.

That it's a great mistake to allow stupendous advertisements in stations. Foreigners might easily mistake "Panklibanon," or "Ozokerit," when in enormous letters on a large board, for the name of the place.

Mem. Panklibanon wouldn't be a bad title ; sounds eastern. "Cedars of Panklibanon," &c. Wonder what Panklibanon really is. One thing I do know, that it is not another name for Canterbury, where we are now halting, and I make this note.

Mem. It is a pity, also, that Guards, Porters, and Officials generally differ as to the time the train is going to stop at an intermediate Station. One says, "Two minutes ;" another, "Hardly a minute ;" a third, "Four minutes ;" a fourth, "Off directly." Our own confidential Guard assures me that I shall have plenty of time for a cup of tea or coffee and a bun, and he will show me the refreshment-room. This results in his getting a glass of beer (from me), and in my ordering a cup of tea, and having it handed to me very hot, when I'm trying to swallow a sponge-cake. The bell rings, somebody outside cries sternly, "Any more going on ?" and our old Guard looks in to say, "Now then, Sir, time's up."

Continuing, on my resuming my seat (being received coldly by my Aunt), to "think," and to make occasional notes (which I manage by grasping my pocket-book tightly in my left hand on my knee, and pressing down upon it heavily and slowly with my pencil, producing thereby a kind of uncial character which subsequently costs me some considerable time and trouble to decipher) would gradually send me to sleep, but for Doddridge, who can't be persuaded that the wheel is not on fire, and my Aunt, who is sure we are going so unsteadily as to be certain of an accident.

Mem. Sympathetic nerves. They make me quite uncomfortable. Doddridge sniffs, and is sure it's fire. My Aunt clutches the seat-arms convulsively every three minutes, and says, jerkily, "I can't stand this—I know I can't"—then she breathes, as if with difficulty, relaxing slightly her hold on the arm—three minutes of quiet travelling—when we come on to a decline, or an incline, or a beautiful bit of engineering, which takes us on to a curve, and nearly sends my Aunt into a fit.

I tell her, cheerfully, that there's nothing to be frightened at, I beg her to think how many thousands travel and yet—

I've done it. Doddridge has begun to sob, and my Aunt is staring, in a three-quarter-face attitude, out of the window, with the tears gradually gathering in both eyes.

What have I said?

* * * * *

Ramsgate.—My Aunt likes to take watering-places at a disadvantage, as it were. She is the guest who comes too early, and witnesses the preparations.

February is not the season for Ramsgate. Ramsgate is "to let." There is no one on the pier. There is no one on the sands. There is no one in the street. There is no one on the promenade.

My Aunt has very nice lodgings. There's a piano in the dining-drawing-room, which I am glad to see.

After all, we shall manage to be cheerful.

Mem. With regard to My Health, go in for diet. Also for quiet. Diet and Quiet. Just the opportunity here. Opportunity also for reading, not writing (except occasional notes), but only reading.

A little music in the evening will be cheerful. I ask my Aunt, after dinner, to sing. She will. Her collection of songs is of a deeply melancholy character. She commences with "The Forsaken," which makes Doddridge, who is in a corner knitting or doing something with a piece of green leather, a pattern, and a needle, snivel. On her finishing, I say, "Very pretty. What is it?" and I examine the copy. Will she sing again? Yes. She selects "My Heart is Sore"—which is very depressing. The burden of this is, that the singer (my Aunt) complains of having been slighted and neglected for another (some other lady), after having trusted herself to the gentleman apostrophised in the ballad as "Ah, cruel! couldst thou" something or other, which he not only apparently could but would, and, for the matter of that, had done, and pretty effectually too.

After this, we three sit thoughtfully (I don't know what I'm thinking about), and the Dove coos plaintively. I sleep next door to the Dove, and hate him.

My Aunt now rises and examines her répertoire. She chooses another. It is "Blighted," which cheerful composition shuts up Doddridge entirely, and sets my Aunt gulping with emotion. She breaks down. They are both crying. What am I to do? I don't feel inclined to cry. I wish I did. I would willingly. My Aunt can't find her pocket-handkerchief, so, it being a lovely evening and warm for this time of year, she goes out of the open window, and sobs on the steps leading into the garden. Doddridge retires. I look at my watch. Nothing to do. No books. Forgot to buy papers. 9.30. Too early for bed. I wonder if this sort of thing will go on every night.

My Aunt says (returning from window), "I'm afraid you'll find it rather dull here."

I reply, "Oh no, not at all. It's just what I want. It'll do me good."

My Aunt hopes it will, and taking her candlestick, goes to bed.

Quarter to ten. Well, yes, I will go to bed. It's so calm and quiet here, I shall get a good night's rest. I might smoke outside. No, it's getting cold, and above all things My Health requires me to be very particular about the night air. Daren't smoke in the house. Perhaps it will do me good to give it up gradually. Am restless.

Bother my Aunt's songs, they've made me quite sad.

In the front of the house it is a calm night: at the back, where my bedroom is, it is a rough night. Peculiarity perhaps of Ramsgate. I've heard that the climate is different on both cliffs, but that there should be scarcely a breath of wind in front of the house and a hurricane at the back-door is a meteorological phenomenon. I am awake at midnight: I am more awake at one a.m.: I am hot and feverish at two. Window rattling, wind howling. I try several "good things for sending you to sleep." I count up to a hundred, and am more wide awake than ever. I try a hundred backwards, and feel quite ready to dress (if they'd only call me now) and go out for a walk. About 2.30 I begin to wander in my mind, then for a short time I am wakeful, then drowsy. I am saying to myself "Now I'm going to sleep," when the Dove in next room commences cooing. I count his cooing. He coos seven times and stops. Thank goodness. He recommences as I am beginning to doze. I count ten coos. I strike a light and look at my watch. 3.30!! and My Health absolutely requires a great deal of sleep. The wind subsides. So does the Dove. I begin to wonder if . . . to arrange what I'll do to-morrow—I will—let me see—I'll—first Knock at door. Hot water. Ah, yes. 7.30, Sir. Quite so. All right. Feeble. To sleep again.

Diary of Next Day. Aunt the embodiment of the soul of punctuality at breakfast. I have to apologise. Storm: new bed: Dove—no, on second thoughts, I won't say anything about the Dove. Delicate ground—it's a pet. Love me, love my Dove. It is trying work for the nerves, living with my Aunt. She starts at the least thing.

If I come into the room at all quietly, she jumps up, exclaiming, "Ah! I do wish you would knock, or cough before you come in."

I'm now always knocking and coughing. I knock first, look in, and then cough. This will become a habit, if I go on with it very long. Then, if I get tired of a book, and drop off to sleep, and the book falls, up jumps my Aunt and presses her hand to her heart, as if I'd shot her.

She will have the coalscuttle outside the room, so that my carrying a scuttleful to put on the fire is a feat not unlike Blondin's walking on the tight-rope. It's most difficult to carry it without spilling a coal, specially while my Aunt is saying "Do take care," and I know that the fall of one lump will make her give such a jump as will be fatal to my steadiness.

If I come upon her suddenly at a turn of the stairs she clutches the banisters, she is so startled. I can't, as it were, accustom her to my appearance. I am the Skeleton popping out of the cupboard, the Ghost on the staircase, the Cuckoo in the clock, the Jack in the box, anything, in fact, sudden in its movement, and startling—that is, as regards my Aunt. I proposed in a satirical mood (of which I afterwards repent, but I was worried) that I should be perpetually playing a trumpet, or have a bell round my neck like Charlie, the little dog.

For me to come in by the window from the garden simply kills her. I never saw anybody so frightened in my life. I explain that I really did not know she was there. Doddridge, calming her, says, "O, Master George, you ought to be more considerate."

WALKING EXERCISE — FLYING — RAMSGATE STREETS — DESCENTS — ASCENTS — RIGHT ANGLES — MY HEALTH — EDUCATION — MEM — DE RAMSGATE A BROADSTAIRS — ALLER ET RETOUR — INTERIOR OF SHOP — JUMPS — NEW VERB — DOG AND CAT — BUDD — A MEETING — PROPOSAL — ENORMITIES — A DEAD 'UN — GASPIPES IN VIEW.

HEN I am obliged to ask Aunt if she wouldn't like to go out for a walk. My walk is a good three-and-a-half miles an hour for a genuine constitutional. My Aunt's is one mile in an hour and a half, with stoppages. Tremendous exercise for control of temper—that's the only exercise it gives me.

I take my Aunt out in a fly—shopping, and to see Ramsgate. Ramsgate, for fly-driving, is a startling place for such a nervous system as my Aunt's. The place reminds me of the Centrifugal Railway where you went down a tremendous incline on the left, were whirled round a circle (still in your car head-over-heels) and shot up another tremendous incline on the right. This is Ramsgate, only without the circle in the centre, its absence being compensated for by gutters, inequalities in the roads, and sharp right-angled corners, which the flies take with a bump that sets 'em all straight again, and puts you right for the next hill.

Going down a Hill.—My Aunt's teeth chatter—she is pale. She draws in her breath : she grasps the side convulsively with one hand, and Doddridge with the other. She is perpetually worrying the driver to "go gently," which results at last in a funereal pace. When we are bumped, which happens every other ten minutes, she shudders and grasps whatever is nearest to her. I protest, I am becoming fearfully nervous myself. The streets of Ramsgate were never meant to accommodate more than one carriage, and you have to go almost out of the town before you can get sufficient room to turn comfortably. When this critical moment arrives, my Aunt simply steps out and stands on the pavement, retiring subsequently within a shop-door, while the flyman is executing this strategic movement. In passing another vehicle we have half an inch between its wheel and ours. It seems as if my Aunt's last moment had come. She clutches at her heart and gasps spasmodically. As to my Nerves and My Health—a few days more of this and I shall be a shattered invalid.

Second Day of this Sort of Thing.—Can't stand it: the two old women, the dog growling, and the turtle-dove cooing will drive me wild.

My Aunt has got an idea that a turtle-dove will talk if properly trained. She practises this for one hour a-day, and asks me to continue when she's tired. The lesson consists in sitting before the cage, and wagging your head from side to side, saying, "Pretty! how d'ye do?" Tends to lunacy.

Mem. Surely this kind of life leads to drinking, or (as I look over the cliff and watch the waves) to—— but no, I can swim.

This state is the worst possible thing for My Health—I feel it. I feel that I am heavy, that I have got a pain in my nose, and that I show signs of being, like Charlie, over-fed. Over-fed! like Charlie; yes, and growling.

But I am out by myself, for the first time. Alone and free. In an East wind, that seems to cut right into you, and make a cold draught, a sort of Suez Canal, through your ribs. I will not return to ask my Aunt, but will go for a constitutional. Where? Look at pocket-book, where I've previously noted what to do at Ramsgate.

Mem. When at Ramsgate go to Broadstairs. Good—will look in at tobacconist's shop and ask my way. I do so.

The dramatis personæ of the shop on my entrance are—old man behind the counter (probably the proprietor), a customer (back view), a large shaggy dog on the floor (evidently a visitor), a big cat on a cigar chest (evidently a resident). The dog is eyeing the cat wistfully, while the cat is lying with her legs comfortably tucked up under her, pretending to be more than half asleep, but, in reality, very much awake. My appearance distracts the dog's attention, and offers him another subject for consideration, namely, my legs. Cat supremely indifferent. Proprietor attending to his business. Customer choosing a tobacco-pouch. Dog suspicious. Myself nervous. I cannot help it; after such a turn as I've had of it with a Jumping Aunt—[Mem. Startling name for a Sensational Novel, My Jumping Aunt.—a ring-dove learning to talk, and a water-nymph (Doddridge, the Crying Maid) of uncertain age (i.e. after fifty). My nerves are quite out of order, and My Health, instead of being improved, is sensibly worsened.

Mem. New verb, To be worsened, i.e., to be made worse. Why not? To be loosened, i.e., to be made loose. Note for book, in futuro.

"Get away, you ruffian!" says the Customer, opportunely interfering with the dog's proceedings, who won't allow me to advance another step. Dog retires (on receiving an admonitory kick from Customer) with a side glance at cat, conveying the idea that he'd very much like to meet her by moonlight alone, and give her a bit of his mind, or rather a bite of it, at the same time sulkily protesting against such treatment before strangers.

This action (i.e. the kick) brings Customer and self face to face, which, by the way, is not generally the result of a kick.

"Why"—he exclaims, staring at me.

"Why"—I exclaim, recognising him in two seconds.

It is Budd. The very fellow of all others for me to meet at this crisis of My Health. Budd is a superlative. He is the jolliest, cheeriest, best looking, best hearted fellow possible. He is what is called a man with his heart in the right place. [Awkward, by the way, if he hasn't; but there are occasions when hearts are not in the right place, as, for instance, in a panic, when someone's "heart's in his mouth" (horrible!), or "sinks into his boots." But this never happens to Budd. He doesn't know what nervousness means, and as for ill health, he appears simply unable to understand it.]

He is hearty.—I am delighted. What has brought us both here? Health. I have come in search of it, he has brought it with him.

"By Jove," he exclaims, after taking a good look at me, "I hardly knew you at first, you've got so tremendously stout."

"Do you think so?" I ask, with an assumption of carelessness, as if it was, after all, only a matter of opinion, and that other people thought I was curiously thin.

"Think so!" says he, "why look here!" and he pinches my arm, and then prods me under (to put it neatly) my fifth rib. I wince. Budd, who was in the Army, has, I find, taken to farming and country pursuits generally, and has an eye for fat, having exhibited pigs and got a medal. "He wants some of this off, eh, doesn't he?" he continues, appealing to the shopkeeper, who smiles, clearly afraid of offending two customers.

"Come and take a Turkish Bath, that's your tip," says Budd; "You'll lose ten pounds of this," another prod in a new place, and shopkeeper much amused, confound his impudence, "in a week, and at the end of a couple of months you'll be fit for a Derby winner."

This view of the result of a course of Turkish Baths is encouraging, though my recollection of having taken one a long time ago in London, is that I was seriously ill for three days after.

"Bosh!" cries Budd, heartily; "You come up with me, and I'll put you through your paces."

I promise to join him in a bath to-morrow. Will he, for company's sake, walk with me to-day? He considers.

"No," he replies; "I can't, because I'm going to commit the enormity of going out fishing."

Everything with him is an enormity. At one o'clock he is going to commit the enormity of taking a brandy and soda, and a biscuit. At this moment he is "going to commit the enormity of smoking a cigar." Falling into his way, I inform him that I propose committing the enormity of walking to Broadstairs.

"Do you good," says he; "take a breather to-day, and go in for the enormity of a Turkish to-morrow, no beer or butter, and you'll enter for the Gaspipe Stakes in a fortnight. Melt some of this off," another prod, "and choke off your nerves, or you're booked for a dead 'un before you know where you are."

With this cheerful view of my case, given in the jolliest manner possible, he summons Growler, the dog, with a playful poke of his stick—very much like what he's been giving me—and marches out, Growler nodding to the cat, and expressing himself to the effect that it won't be long before he has the pleasure of seeing her again.

I am determined. Now I see my way. "Breathers" and Turkish Baths, versus "being a dead 'un before I know where I am."

Subject of consideration to occupy time of walk will be, how can I manage to get quit of my Aunt, Doddridge, and the Dove, or, to put it in Budd's style, how can I commit the enormity of choking off my Aunt & Co. (representing my nervous system), train for a gaspipe match, and so avoid the melancholy contingency of being booked for a dead 'un. Think it over.

CHAPTER VI.

TO BROADSTAIRS—THE WALK—PROJECTS—SUDDEN SHOCKS—SOLITARY PROMENADE — DARWIN — DONKEY — MEM.—
TENNYSON — NEW VIEWS — THOUGHTS ON WAVES — OBESITY—NOTES ON BROADSTAIRS—RETURN OF THE WANDERER.

COMING to Broadstairs from Ramsgate.—Beautiful weather between Broadstairs and Ramsgate. Ramsgate has several sorts of weather all at once ; and having paid your money (for lodgings or hotel), you can take your choice.

After meeting Budd I feel better. I am cheered by the prospect of Turkish Baths and probable reduction. Think, as I walk on, that on my return I will take a more decided line with my Aunt. What the decided line shall be I don't exactly see, but generally speaking I might alter my conduct towards her. For instance, when she's frightened, on meeting me suddenly on the stairs (we almost live on the stairs, as I am perpetually returning from going to fetch my Aunt's pocket-handkerchief, and she's as often coming up after me to tell me that she's found it in the piano), I can laugh boisterously, and pretend it's good fun. Laugh her out of her "nerves" as it were. When she cries, instead of being too sympathetic, I can say, "What's the use of tears ! Why give way ?" which latter arguing sounds like an advertisement, with an answer after it, telling you not to give way on the cheapest plan.

Sudden Shock to Nervous System.—There are no railings or posts along the cliff between Broadstairs and Ramsgate. A meditative person might easily step over the edge. Very dangerous. Find I've been following a path which actually has been made to lead to the very verge, and have luckily pulled up short. What pulled me up short? Instinct?*

Mem. Write to Mr. Darwin on this subject. What I want to draw his attention to is that my mind was occupied with one line of thought—far away from cliffs and precipices—but that suddenly something pulled me up with a jerk and prevented me going over. I notice a donkey grazing within three inches of the edge. He is evidently thinking of his dinner. He moves on quietly and fearlessly, vegetating. He doesn't even give a side glance at his danger. He is dining, like Damocles, with the sword over him. Change "o" into "a," and say sward under him—which suggestion turns the current of my thoughts. I rise (having seated myself to write this note for Darwin before I forget it), and leave Damocles the donkey.

Mem. Before I move on again. People say that when at a dizzy height one feels an irresistible inclination to throw oneself over. I don't. Nothing like it. But approaching a trifle too near, I do feel a sort of vibration about the knees, something like the sensation in a nightmare when you're falling down-stairs without your legs. Used I to experience this before living with my Aunt, Doddridge, Charlie, and the Turtle Dove? Don't think so.

* Advice to tourists who may be taking this walk: Never turn your back to the sea. Never take your eyes off the footpath. The perils of this walk are (to the incautious and venturesome) quite equal to any Alpine danger. This will be no slight recommendation to those who cannot afford a visit to the Alps, or who detest climbing. When the authorities (whoever they may be) have put a hand-railing along the edge of the cliff, all the excitement will be at an end.

Not a soul to be met. Peacefully quiet. This is Ramsgate-cum-Broadstairs out of season. Sit down again and think. This process will restore nerves. But is sitting down good for exercise? Yes; and go on again, fresher.

Melancholy is marking me for its own. I will sit and write Thoughts on Waves. Fancy there's some sort of poetic feeling in me—(Mem. Write to Mr. Darwin again. Think I could support his theory with an argument. Work it out.)—latent, and to be developed by solitude.

Thoughts on Waves (in Note-book, to be developed).—The bold, blustering wave which froths and foams . . . [Wonder how Tennyson would express this? Can one take lessons in poetry? Might write and ask him. How much a lesson? Mem. for Darwin and Tennyson. Not bad idea to ask them both to dinner. Literary party with Budd, and a sporting dash in it, to "commit the enormity" of taking a glass of wine, with pleasure, &c., &c. Think it out.] . . . and foams like a raving maniac, and being without a strait waistcoat . . . ["Wave in a strait waistcoat"—Query for Tennyson, poetical idea, or not?] . . . dashes itself upon the rocks and . . . and . . . , there's an end of it. (Mem. This wants finish.)

Another Thought on Another Wave.—A feminine wave coming up with a slight rustle like the sound of a lady's dress—(material immaterial; never know what ladies' dresses are made of, except silk). It curtsies, makes a slight advance, then bashfully retreats, and . . . is seen no more.

Wave Number Three.—The cautious wave, which, knowing how thoroughly out of its element it will be on shore, joins two speculative friends who are making the expedition. The firm (unlimited liability) reaches the sands, and breaks.

Names for Waves.—The Barber Waves. They get up a great lather, then leave the sand clear as a fresh-shaven face.

Leapfrog Waves—which rush after one another, jump on to each other's backs, fall together, and roll over and over on the shore.

Notes finished. Rise : with difficulty. Rheumatism? Or obesity? Horrid word, "obesity." Perhaps rheumatism and obesity. Take sharp walk on to Broadstairs. Very dull. Wish there was somebody to talk to. A walking-stick would be a companion. Will get one at Broadstairs. Begin to feel hungry. Mustn't eat anything between breakfast and dinner, if I want to get into good condition. Yet I should like to commit the enormity (can't help quoting Budd while I am alone—it seems sociable) of taking a little bread and cheese and a glass of beer. It ought to be water, not beer ; but it won't matter just for once, as to-morrow I begin Budd's plan, and take Turkish baths.

Broadstairs.—Viewed from cliff. Not a soul visible anywhere. Broadstairs probably at luncheon, or taking a siesta. I feel almost afraid of stepping in, and disturbing it. Sit on bench, and watch for signs of life. . . . Two figures emerge from somewhere in the town. . . . I am interested. . . . They disappear above . . . they re-appear below, on the sands, where they at once lie at full length. One is in a bright blue blouse, and the other in a whitish coat. Who? . . . On further inspection . . . there is no doubt of it . . . they are the butcher and the baker, of Broadstairs, and this is all they've got to do.

I walk on. To the hotel. From the coffee-room window I have a full view of the Parade (?), and on the coffee-room walls

I can amuse myself with prints of Hogarth's Marriage à la Mode. Children and nurses appear on Parade ; also two Bath chairs with invalids.

Plenty of invalids here, probably. Bantingising, or vegetarianising : which would account for the idleness of the butcher and baker, still lying at full length on the sands, where I view them again while luncheon is being prepared.

It is quite refreshing to talk to anyone. To the barmaid, for example, after the silent walk. I say, "Good day." So does she. I ask what there is for luncheon, as a sort of façon de parler. She shows me a glass-case with curiosities in beef, mutton, chicken, and something bony, with a good deal of fat, also a faded ham. I feel inclined to say, "Ah ! very interesting !" as if I was examining a museum. "Any fish ?" No ; of course no fish, being at the sea-side. Well, then, I will commit the enormity of bread and cheese. She retires, sulkily, I think, as much as to say, "Is that all you've come for ?" Really to oblige her, and get her to be chatty (merely for sociability's sake) I would willingly commit other enormities, such as chicken, salad, soup, and a bottle of the Best. No : will restrain myself : remember, a constitutional is my object, not luncheon. I ask her, pleasantly, "Many people here ?" She replies, unpleasantly, "Yes," and I don't believe her. I say, more pleasantly . . . (Mem. Conversation is quite an art. Wasn't there someone called "Conversation Tommy" ?—friend of George the Fourth's. Think so. . . . But you must have two to a conversation as to a quarrel.) "You can't be doing much business now, out of the season ?" which is intended to veil a complimentary allusion to their vast business in the season. She replies, curtly, "Quite as much as we want ;" and resumes some knitting, or stitching. Ah ! Well . . . will go and buy a walking-stick.

Noticeable features at Broadstairs.—All the shops do each other's business. An unsettled trade, as much as to say "We'll see what sells best, and then stick to that." For instance, the tobacconist sells walking-sticks. At the photographer's you can get boots. At the bootmaker's there is a fine collection of photographs, chiefly of people celebrated at Broadstairs, or celebrated for being at Broadstairs. Perhaps they'd be glad of mine as "A Visitor to Broadstairs." At the hatter's they deal in petticoats and crinolines. At the draper's there are valentines, music, and I think cheap toys.

The only shop which appears to be doing a fixed business is a small sweet-shop, in a passage leading to and from the Parade. Passing on to the Parade, I look over on to the sands. Butchre and baker still at full length. Children are coming out in great numbers. This accounts for the thriving state of the sweet trade, and the indolence of the butcher and baker; though, by the way, one cannot arrive at any definite conclusion from this, as it is probably, from their mode of doing things at Broadstairs, that when they're at home, the baker is a fishmonger, and the butcher deals in vegetables, and perhaps lets out Bath-chairs. Perhaps the butcher and baker, having nothing to do, are making arrangements for an amicable interchange of goods (on a Mutual Subsistence Company principle) until the return of the season.

Lunch.—Bread and cheese is simple and enticing. More children out. Three more Bath-chairs. Finished. Walk out. Look over cliff. Butcher and baker still there. Walk out of Broadstairs. Same sort of country as it was when walking into Broadstairs.

Through Broadstairs once more. Children and invalids disappeared. Tea-time probably. Take same seat as before; a bench commanding the town. Look on the sands. Butcher and baker there, still at full length. They came at two, it is now 4'30. I've got two hours before me to dinner-time. Wonder how long they (the butcher and baker) will stop on the sands.

The Butcher and Baker were two pretty men,
They lay on the sands till the clock struck ten.
Up jumps the Baker, and looks at the sky,
"O brother Butcher, the moon's very high."

Five o'Clock.—Baker sitting up. Butcher sitting up, too, stretching. Both stretch: rise, and lounge off. Evidently tea-time. Perhaps (on the Mutual Subsistence Co. idea) the baker gives the butcher tea, finding muffins, crumpets, and toast, the grocer bringing in tea and sugar, and the milkman milk, as their share of the risk. Dinner arrangement would be butcher gives dinner (that is, meat) to the company, the greengrocer finding potatoes, the baker bread, the publican beer, and the confectioner would come in with the tarts. I fancy that the greengrocer would get the best of it.

I follow their example, and disappear. I return to Ramsgate.

CHAPTER VII.

THE CRAMVILLE HOTEL—NOVEL IDEAS—RAMSGATE BOULEVARDS—JOSLYN & BUDD—DINNER PROPOSITION—THE SECRETARY—THE VERANDAH—LETTER TO MY AUNT—WITTLES—MR. DAVATI—HUNT & WINLEY—COZENS—HOOKER THE CHEMIST—MISS PUFFHAM THE PRETTY—IRISH WAITER—TABLE D'HÔTE SYSTEM—PUBLIC AND PRIVATE DINNER—THE IRATE MAN—THE MODEST MAN—THE DINNERLESS MAN—"CHAIRMAN ! TO BILLIARDS."

WHAT a nuisance a walk back again is ! Progress is the law of Nature. Becoming melancholy and nervous once more. Prospect of dinner with my Aunt. What I should like would be a jovial party. Something to stir one up. That's what my health requires ; "stirring up." I pause in front of the new hotel, East Cliff. Striking. Handsome. First idea seems to be that a lot of people in a row of gothic private houses thought they'd knock down all the partition walls, and live happily together. Second idea seems to have been, "Let's make it a hotel." Response, "Let's." Other subsequent ideas appear to have been, impulsively, "Let's build a smoking-room on the roof ! Let's put up a flag !!" Then, rushing down-stairs again, "Let's make a croquet-ground !!" Then, when out of doors, "Let's have a refreshment-room, to save going into the hotel again !!" Then, "Let's have a tunnel under the cliff to the sands. O let's!!!!!" And, magnificent conception, "Let's pull down the cliff!!!!!!" Apparently, carried nem. con. Then, being on the sands, "What a bore to go up to the hotel again, just when one's getting comfortable. Let's have a restaurant on the sands, led up to by tunnel, and by carriage-road made in the cliff when they've nearly pulled down the cliff and built up a strong wall!"

Next Step.—Somebody who didn't play croquet and didn't care about walking, exclaims, "Let's have a Rotten Row!!" Resolution, with amendment, of "With trees on either side, as on the Boulevards." Carried again, nem. con. Then somebody, an invalid, who didn't want to cross the sea, suggested sulphur baths. So they all said "Let's" again; and Budd tells me that here are the Turkish, and the sulphurs (not yet finished), and the ozone baths (a new invention), and the secretary to explain everything generally, to whom and a friend he (Budd) is talking as they come up towards me, while I am standing surveying the mighty whole, admiringly, for in a very short time it will really be a beautiful place.

Budd's friend is a sporting man of the tight trouser order. Budd tells me (privately afterwards, on my inquiring something about his friend, whom I think I know by sight) that "he" (his friend Joslyn) "is down there to keep quiet a bit, having blistered his fortune severely," from which (assisted by details in ordinary language) I gather that Joslyn's course of "blistering" has drawn pretty well all his money out of him.

Budd informs me that they (he and Joslyn) are going to commit the enormity of dining at the Cramville. Just what I should like. But the fact is—my Aunt—

"O!" exclaims Budd, as if he'd known her for years, "she won't mind. Say it's to meet Banting."

Joslyn seconds the invitation, and the secretary (of course quite an unbiassed individual) suggests, in an offhand way, as if he was patronising the establishment out of kindness, that we might do worse. I make one difficulty hesitatingly, that is, I must let them know I'm not coming. "Send a boy," says Budd. The secretary is of opinion, doubtfully, and still only in the character of a casual visitor and unconnected with the interior economy of the hotel, that "Yes—oh—there's some one you can send," and then resumes an explanation, which my appearance had interrupted, as to how a certain verandah had been put up in two weeks—a feat apparently unequalled in the annals of building, painting, and decorating, and which they'd never have done without him, the secretary, who kept 'em at it. We congratulate him on the verandah. Budd observes that it "gives quite a ——" and finishes his sentence with a flourish of his stick, to which the secretary replies, "Yes, doesn't it?" and Joslyn, who has never set eyes on the place before, remarks that that's just what was wanted. I add, "Yes, decidedly;" and to show that I have interested myself in the matter, turn to the secretary and inquire, "Only a fortnight?" To which he returns, "Only a fortnight," whereupon I say "Indeed!" and we all stand stock still, and, having nothing better to do, stare at the verandah for about three minutes.

Then Budd observes decisively, that "It's a great improvement," and the secretary, really pleased, says, "Yes, isn't it? Only a fortnight!" To which Joslyn, by way of variation, returns, "But, I suppose you made 'em stick to it." This causes the secretary to shake his head knowingly, as much as to say, "Didn't I? I should rather say I did," when Budd throws in, as if skilled in these matters, "Sharp work, a fortnight," and nods fiercely. The secretary answers interrogatively, "Yes, wasn't it?" And I (feeling bound to join in, or he might think I differed with him, and wasn't pleased with his efforts) answer positively, and as summing up the whole case, "Yes, it was."

We spend about half an hour surveying the verandah, and playing this sort of languid conversational battledore and shuttlecock always with the same shuttlecock, when I conclude that it is time to write to my Aunt. Daren't return home and say cheerfully, "Going to dine out to-night," as I know she'd shed floods of tears, and I should be upset for a week. No, in the interests of my health, I will dine with fresh companions and write (after some consideration) to my Aunt.

Letter (carefully considered) to my Aunt:—

"Dear Aunt,—I am very sorry," was very nearly putting "deuced sorry," but "sorry" won't do in any case. Begin again, not scratching out, but on another sheet. "My dear Aunt"—"My" is more affectionate—"I am very much grieved"—no, that'll frighten her, and she'll think there's been an accident. Recommence—"My dearest Aunt"—I have two other aunts, so that the superlative is correct and complimentary, besides being conciliatory—"I am very much afraid that I shall not be able to return in time for dinner to-night"—she'll naturally ask why I stopped on my road to write? Can't help it. Will send it at last moment, just as we're sitting down, and risk it,—"as I have met a man whom I have not seen for years,"—dash "years" underneath strongly. If it means Joslyn, I've never seen him before—"and a very old friend"—meaning Budd—"and, as they may be going away for good to-morrow, perhaps to India,"—of course, they may be, and my object being explanatory and conciliatory—"I could not refuse to spend an hour or so"—vague "or so," but leaves a margin for after dinner—"with them. Hoping—I am just going to add “that you are quite well,” better not—“that this will cause you no inconvenience, I remain, your very Affectionate Nephew, GEORGE.”

Budd comes in, and says “Wittles,” and finding my letter finished, sends it by Hunt, the porter, to whom I give a shilling, and we are all jovial.

Mem. Another peculiarity about Budd. He is a capital fellow for any place. Always knows who everybody is, and gives you their style, title, and occupation, all compact. For instance, I ask, “Who’s that?” meaning the secretary of Verandah fame. That Budd informs me, is “Mr. Davati, the secretary.” The man at the door who has gone with my letter is “Hunt, the porter.” The civil and most obliging young gentleman in the bar is “Winley, the clerk.” Then there’s—when we go to wash our hands—“Mrs. Prymmer, the housekeeper,” and “Jane, the chambermaid.” A man comes with the secretary into the coffee-room—“Who’s that?”

Mem. You get, out of season at Ramsgate, in a chronic state of asking, “Who’s that?” arrivals being interesting.

“That?” says Budd. Then, after looking round, he tells us, confidentially, and as something that’s not to go any farther, “That’s Cozens, the contractor.”

A very pretty girl passes before our window, along the new Rotten Row. Who is she? Budd thinks (he doesn’t know) that she’s one of the Puffhams, the Pastrycook’s. An elderly man passing her, bows. He (therefore) interests us deeply. “Who is he?” “He?” says Budd. “Why” (here he takes another look at him, and either recognises him or invents the name on the spur of the moment), “that’s Hooker, the chemist.”

Here we arrive at our second glass of sherry after the fish, and I to repress Joslyn, who is inclined towards a libertine tone, observe that "the young lady who has just passed has, it struck me," I threw this in to show that I'm only speaking from a merely artistic point of view, "very beautiful eyes."

"Hasn't she!" exclaims Budd. "I say, you must go in for the Turkish bath, and cut out old Pill-Box." By which he means that when I have reduced my tendency to stoutness, I can take the earliest opportunity of getting an introduction to the young lady with the beautiful eyes, and establishing myself as a successful rival to old Pill-Box, that is, Hooker, the chemist, who, after all, as far as we've seen from our window, has only taken his hat off to her most respectfully.

We continue our dinner. Everything very good, when it arrives. We have to wait some time between the courses, owing, it appears, to its being the first night of the table d'hôte—by way of experiment—and more people have patronised it than they had expected. This distracts the waiters, and private diners don't get attended to. Wish we'd dined at table d'hôte. [We do so another day, and imagine ourselves on the Continent. If the table d'hôte system is adopted here generally, the novelty of travelling abroad will be at an end. Think this out.]

There are two gentlemen at separate tables, dining in the Coffee-room, one in the corner, the other by the fire. The one in the corner is plaintive; the other, by the fire, is peremptory, and evidently not to be trifled with. He is trifled with, however. It appears that he has ordered his favourite dish—a veal cutlet; and, instead of that, they have brought him a ham sandwich. On his remonstrating violently, the waiter disappears with the ham, and soon after another enters with a dish of fish, which he places before him.

"What the deuce is this?" says the man by the fire.

"Didn't ye orther fish, sorr?" asks a most polite waiter of Irish extraction.

"No!" replies the visitor, savagely. "I——" when he is interrupted by a touchingly-sad voice from the corner, which says, "I ordered fish; it's my fish, I think. I've been waiting half an hour for it—I've had nothing since soup."

Joslyn whispers to us that we (our party) have had that party (in the corner's) fish, and the waiter whisks it away from the angry man by the fire to place it before the famished sufferer.

Angry man, who begins to think he's lost a chance of something, at any rate, begins, "But, I say, waiter, I ordered——"

"Comin', sorr, derectly," replies the Irish attendant soothingly, and vanishes.

Our dinner is going on well: wine excellent: table nicely arranged: room charming: Gothic furniture: everything so nice, clean, and comfortable.

"Now," says Joslyn, who, it appears, understands ordering a dinner, "I've got for you a compôte of pigeon coming, which, I think, you'll like."

We wait. Budd suggests filling up the time with the enormity of a glass of claret. We do it. A waiter (quite new to us) rushes in with a covered dish and plates. Great excitement on the part of Man by the Fire. "Ha! ha!" we hear him exclaim, "At last!" and he begins to flourish a knife and fork. Waiter smiles, and plumps dish down on table before him, plate also. Irate Man audibly smacks his lips and draws in his breath as if in for a good thing. Now then. Waiter whisks off cover. Angry and hungry man ready to plunge his knife and fork in, pauses, as if struck electrically, "Why, dash it" (dash is not the word) "it's Pudding!!" They've brought him apple-pudding.

"Confound it! Why, I—I—" he can hardly speak, he's so angry. "I haven't had any meat yet. Take it away, and—and—" in a voice of thunder, "Dash it WILL you bring my VEAL CUTLET!!"

Mild Man, plaintively in corner, is here heard. He raises his voice and arrests the waiter's attention, "I'll take the pudding," which, as he's only just done his fish, proves him to be of an accommodating disposition.

The waiter is about to comply with his request when another official rushes in, all hot, blows up the first waiter, takes the pudding angrily from him, and both vanish in a flash of excitement, before the Angry Man, now fuming, can take advantage of a new waiter's appearance to demand his rights in veal cutlets. Enter third waiter with our Compôte of Pigeon. [Our dinner goes on pleasantly enough; we can understand the "waits" which are quite in-keeping with the first night of a new piece (i.e. of The Table d'Hôte specially at this unseasonable time), and we fill up our intervals with the wine, which Joslyn has craftily ordered beforehand. Compôte excellent. First-rate chef at the Cramville.] On apparition of third waiter, angry and starving person by fire is at him, "Look here, waiter, I can't stand this." Waiter replies, en passant, "In one minute, sir, I'll attend to you," which causes him to rise from table, take his hat, hesitate, put it down again irritably, reseal himself, and then he finds Waiter Number Three opposite him, asking placidly, "Have you ordered anything, sir?" This sends him up again; he nearly kicks over the table. "Ordered!" he exclaims, then restraining himself by a great effort for a second, he bangs his fist on the table, and in a tone of what the opera librettists call "suppressed fury," exclaims, "Where's My VEAL CUTLET!"

The waiter is perfectly calm, and indeed sympathetic—but confoundedly irritating (we agree to that) when he asks, in a tone of interest, "Haven't you had it, sir?"

This is too much for the Man by the Fire. "Had it!!" he shouts. "Why, I've been waiting here—I've only had soup—they brought me pudding—and—and—here, DASH it, send the Manager." He is so savage under much provocation that he orders the Manager as if he were a dish, and he intended dining off him instead of veal cutlets.

The mild voice from the corner here addresses the waiter. "If I can't get anything else, I'll take some sugar." Poor man! Sugar is hardly a substitute, even to the happiest disposition, for three courses, entrées, rôti, and dessert. Will he, the Mild Man in the Corner, take some cold beef? Certainly; whatever he can get; and he has it. Not so the Man by the Fire, who will have the Manager, and nothing but the Manager. He refuses such blandishments (chiefly offered by the pacificating Irish waiter) as "Would ye take some cold beef, sorr, and" (as an additional inducement) "pickles?" He dashes pickles. No, where's the Manager? "He's comin', sorr—but won't ye take some—some cold ham, or"—vaguely—"a cut off the joint, with"—another inducement—"potatoes?" The indignant visitor by the fire won't have anything or anybody except the Manager.

Enter a respectable man, respectful and attentive. The waiters remain to listen. "Who's that?" Budd is ready—"Merks, the Manager." Mr. Merks has a talent evidently for taming violent guests, like Rarey's with obstreperous horses. He bows, he is grave, he is deeply interested; he attempts no explanation except the true one, of their being, he regrets to say, unprepared for such a sudden influx of business, and is positive that nothing of the sort shall occur again.

"It is," he adds, "most unfortunate," and while he is yet talking, a new waiter, entering quietly, artfully places before the almost exhausted stranger a dish of veal cutlets, some asparagus, and a pint bottle of claret. His complaints subside into an explanation (almost apologetic) about his having had a long walk, and being peculiarly hungry, and so he is gradually soothed, and his equilibrium restored. As to what becomes of the unfortunate gentleman in the corner, who dined off "fish first" and "sugar to follow," he has disappeared during the above conversation. He has left in despair. His affecting story might be entitled The Dinnerless Man, a companion tale to the Shadowless Man. We wonder if he paid for the sugar.

We adjourn to the billiard-room, where we smoke and take coffee. The Cramville is, certainly, as a hotel, unique. A Gothic hotel. Gothic furniture, with variations. The billiard-room, a cheerful room of a sort of Japanese Gothic, as if the Mikado (or whatever the dignitary is) had suddenly exhibited High Church tendencies, but, being only half converted, had ended in building a billiard-room. All very charming and pleasant; and so we sit and take our coffee, and look at the billiard-table. I look at my watch to see about returning to my Aunt.

Thoughts on this Subject.—If she's up, I shan't want to see her. Should frighten her, perhaps. If she's in bed I can't see her (and she'd frighten me, perhaps). If they're all gone to bed I needn't ring, as one of the peculiarities of Ramsgate is, from what I have noticed, open house all day and night. Confiding, but foolish. Useful, however, on occasion, but not now.

Budd is "walking my way," he says, "so if I stop just for one game of billiards, we'll go together." By all means. He at present proposes committing the enormity of "B & S's," adding that "he's quite given up this sort of thing at night. Never mind : Turkish Bath to-morrow." Billiards.

BILLIARDS.—Budd asks Joslyn if he'll play a game. Joslyn will, but observes that "he hasn't touched a cue for years." Budd now tries to remember when it was that he last played a game. He decides that it was ever so long ago.

Mem. Good plan this ; because, 1stly, if you play badly, why, it is evidently because you're out of practice. 2ndly, if you astonish yourself by making brilliant strokes, it will be clear to your friend that you used to be a first-rate player, and haven't forgotten your science. It is arranged that I am to play the winner. I only remark that it's getting very late. Budd answers carelessly that we shan't be more than twenty minutes. * * *

Whether it's the dinner of yesterday, or the late hours, or the change of the weather, I don't know, but I am not so well this morning. It's true that Budd said, "Never mind what you do to-day (yesterday) because to-morrow (that's now to-day) you'll begin your Turkish Baths ;" but still it only shows me that I must be particular as to what I do. It is evident (if yesterday's doings were the cause of to-day's indisposition) that among the things I cannot do with impunity is a dinner given by Joslyn, billiards, champagne, sherry, various drinks afterwards, and to bed late.

I write down my symptoms in a diary, so as to be able to refer to it afterwards when consulting a doctor. An excellent plan, and as the advertisement says of the Cocoa (which I mustn't touch) "highly recommended by the Faculty."

Symptoms of To-day. Diary of Health.—Hot nose. . . . I pause for awhile to think what else! I have got a sort of headache but not quite a headache. I mean not a headache that makes you say, "O do go away. . . . No, I don't want anything, thank you—" ("Thank you" being given very politely, and meaning "May the anathemas," &c., &c.) "If you'd only kindly leave me alone . . . and do ask that dove not to coo . . . and please shut up that—that—dog . . . if I could only sleep I might. . . ."

No, it's not that sort of thing. Then there's a pain on my eyelids, but not a definite pain, so I can't put it down. General lassitude, perhaps, and a feeling of increased fatness, that is, what the tailors mean when, having shouted out to the man in the box, "Ninety-six and a half!" they add, cheerfully, "A trifle stouter, Sir, I think, than last time;" and you suddenly pulling yourself up very upright, expand your chest, and partially correct the mistake by explaining, "and broader," in order to show him that the increase below is, after all, only symmetrically in keeping with extension above. This is what I experience this morning. After this diagnosis I sum up truthfully in my Diary of Health. Day of the Month. Time. Hot nose. General tightness. Weather. N.E. wind. Appetite, nothing remarkable, chiefly an inclination towards dry toast, and a feeling of disgust for butter.

I do not like this Hot Nose. Suppose it swells. Suppose it gradually becomes redder and redder, a consequence of getting hotter and hotter. I am sure that a hot nose is a sign of debility; Mulfer, my medical friend, once told me so, and I took to port wine. Port wine, everybody is aware, produces this-sort of nose; therefore the remedy was, I, hope homœopathic. I don't think it has ever gone entirely away, but has been stealing gradually upwards like afternoon shadows on a mountain. Occasions will bring out my Hot Nose symptom. The colour seems, as it were, to be done in a sort of invisible ink in which secret despatches used to be written, and which only show out after a warming before a fire. Joslyn's dinner has done it. Or, perhaps, to put it more fairly, not being prepared for Joslyn's dinner by a series of entertainments leading up to Joslyn's dinner, has done it. My Aunt's and Doddridge's ideas of feeding are of the plainest description; so, to come (as it were) suddenly on a dinner like Joslyn's, is really a startler to my Health.

As to my Nerves this morning, I feel that I can't bear anything or anybody, but that's owing to my Aunt, not Joslyn.

I can't arrive at the condition of my Nerves, because there's a shrill voice at the back of the house, out in the road, which will go on crying out, "Georgina!" in three distinct syllables. I try to see where the owner of the voice is, but can't from my window. It's fearful. "Geor-gee-ner!" Then, after a few seconds' rest, "Geor-gee-ner!" I'd Georgeener her—whatever that might be—if I caught her. If I could see her, I'd tap at the window severely, and threaten her.

The door of the yard is blown open, and I see the little miscreant now—a child of about eight or ten, or twelve, perhaps (for I never can make out children's ages by their appearance, and there really appears to be no rule as to when a child ought to begin to talk) is standing in the middle of the road, calling "Geor-gee-ner!" Georgeener is somewhere in the distance, and won't answer. It paralyses my dressing. I stand at the window, mesmerised by this child. She doesn't change her key, or her emphasis, or her intonation. She stands quite still, and does it mechanically. I tap my window sharply. She can't hear. Why can I hear her?

"Geor-gee-ner!" for the twentieth time.

I will ring. I do ring. It takes a good deal of ringing to fetch up our enormous Housemaid at the lodgings. She is so big that she can't come up with one pull: three good ones do it as a rule, and then not without a consultation with some one (generally the Cook) invisible. The ceremony of ringing the bell for Mary is as follows:—

One pull. No effect whatever.

Second pull. A louder one; audible as sounding down-stairs somewhere. Indistinct murmurs also arise from below, like those made by a distant crowd on the stage. Burden of indistinct chorus, apparently. (Strophe) "Where's Mary?" (Anti-strophe) "Don't know. Up-stairs, I think." That's another curious thing, she's always up-stairs.

Third pull. Much louder, and of a remonstrative character.

Mem. Subject for something, "Bells and Bellringers, by One of Themselves." Also, "How to Wait, by a Waiter." Think it out. "Geor-gee-ner!!"

Third pull is immediately followed by a bell up-stairs. This brings out Mary (she is about six feet high, and would have made a capital companion to a plough-boy, as a plough-girl, if there is such a person) from somewhere above. She wants to know, over the banisters, to save trouble. "What bell's that?"

Answer from an invisible's unrecognisable voice below, "Dining-room, I think." Mary comes down lumpily. She hasn't heard distinctly, "What bell?" she asks, rather crossly. Cook's voice from below fancies it's Dining-room. Mary heard murmuring something about she wishes as something, &c., &c., and Cook heard in answer that she did, &c., &c., whatever it is; to which Mary replies grumpily, that she (Mary) thinks as she (Cook) might, &c., &c., and then she goes to the Dining-room and inquires, as if out of pure curiosity, "Did you ring, Mum?" of my Aunt.

It takes all this time to get Mary to come to my door. When she arrives it occurs to me that I have no right to interfere with a child's holloaing Georgeener out in the road, but still, if it's a nuisance (and it is), why not remove it?

I tell Mary from my side of the door that there is a child, &c., &c., and will she oblige me by stepping out and sending the child away. She will. I hear her go to the front door, but, in the interval between the first bell-pull and this, Georgeener has responded to the summons, and the child has disappeared. Mary lumps back again, and says through the door, "There ain't none, Sir," and away she goes up-stairs to the top of the house, so as to be well out of the way of the next down-stairs bell.

I finish my dressing, and join my Aunt at breakfast.

I knock at the door, in order not to startle her, and enter. Must be very conciliatory this morning. The wicker dove-cote is on the table, and my Aunt is engaged at the side-board, getting out some seed. She has not heard me. I foresee what will happen when she turns round. She'll be fearfully startled, and go off into something or other jerky—not hysterics, but a sort of spasmodic faint peculiarly her own.

Shall I retire, on tiptoe, and re-enter presently. If she turned and caught me stealing out, the consequences might be serious, and in my present state I don't know but that I might have a fit myself.

Shall I cough? Shall I speak? Not too suddenly. She is so engaged with her bird-seed that whatever I do she must jump. Suddenly it occurs to me to take up the newspaper and say, "Good morning, Aunt." . . I say it . . . it's all over. . . . She has knocked over the bird-seed bag, the tray, and the water, and is clutching the side-board with one hand, and plucking at her left side with the other.

I wish I knew what to do in these cases.

I've heard something about "good things" to do with hysterical subjects—one was, I think, "Hold 'em down and stamp on 'em." Another, "Stuff a pocket-handkerchief in their mouths." Another, "Beat their open palms." Another, "Undo the collar; give them air" (what with? the bellows if at hand?)

CHAPTER IX.

THE DIFFICULTY SOLVED—AFFECTATION—"TEARS, IDLE TEARS"—OP, HOP, AND POP—IDEAL TELEGRAM—CHIPPINESS—GROWLER—LODGERS—DISTINGUISHED RESIDENTS—EAST AND WEST—"PECULIAR PEOPLE"—MY AUNT'S PROMENADE.

BEST thing to do.—Ring for Doddridge. Ring violently. Same work as before; Mary from upstairs, Cook from below, Landlady from somewhere else inquiring if that was the Drawing-room bell, and finally, by accident, Doddridge comes in and finds my Aunt having fits on one side of the room, and me on the other looking at her. I tell her, I can't make out what's the matter with my Aunt. This sets Doddridge off. She exclaims, "O, Master George, how can you say such things!"

I ascertain afterwards from her that my observation about "not knowing what was the matter with my Aunt," conveyed the idea to her (Doddridge's) mind, that my Aunt was intoxicated.

My Aunt recovers, and I rush up-stairs for her pocket-handkerchief, subsequently found shut in the piano.

"I hope," I observe, when all is calm again, "that I didn't cause you any inconvenience last night," meaning by sending my note to say I was staying out to dinner.

"No, George," she replies, sadly, and sighs.

Mem. to myself. Better drop the conversation. Two words more, and tears. Recommence with an entire change of subject presently. I notice that Charlie, the little dog, is limping. I pity him, and say so. ("Love me, love my," &c. Politic.)

My Aunt replies, rather severely, "O, there's nothing the matter with him: it's only affectation."

My Aunt, I discover, sets down almost all maladies (not her own) to affectation. Complaining to her that my nose has become red, and is certainly swollen, she replies, "Nonsense! it's all affectation." She wishes to know, before I go out, if I am coming back to dinner to-day, as she really never was so much frightened as when she received that message yesterday.

"Ah, it did, indeed!" chimes in Doddridge. "You should have more consideration, Master George."

I feel inclined to say, "O, what confounded nonsense!" but what I do say is, that I am very sorry, and I am certainly coming back to dinner to-day.

"We can't give you such things as you get at the hotel," says my Aunt, plaintively.

I reply cheerily that "There's no dinner I enjoy more than a simple chop."

The word "chop" does it. My Aunt bursts into tears. Heaven only knows why.

Mem. When with my Aunt avoid all mention of chops. And N. B. Note down while staying with my Aunt at Ramsgate what subjects make her cry—in order to avoid them. By the way, as I jot this down in my note-diary, it suddenly occurs to me that the other day, when we were talking about dancing parties, I remarked to my Aunt that I had enjoyed a hop somewhere or other. Scarcely had the word "hop" escaped me, than my Aunt, with eyes gradually filling, repeated it once, looked me full in the face, then, turning away, burst into tears, just as she has done at the word "chop."

Psychological Query.—Do all words ending in "op" make my Aunt cry? If so, one knows what to avoid. Might try one more, to make certain. Three would form a sort of quorum, and decide it. Mem. To try "pop" on the earliest opportunity, and see how she stands it. If it does not affect her, then try "drop," and finish appropriately with "stop."

Feeling that I am helpless here, I retire. As I go down the passage the dove coos and the dog barks. I feel worried. This sort of thing is trying and wearing. I must thank my Aunt for her kindness, and get some one to send me a telegram to say—

"Come at once. Business of Importance."

Then I can get away.

Budd is just passing the door. "Hallo!" says he, "off to the bath of the Turk, eh?"

I tell him "yes;" and add that I don't feel very well to-day, and I can't make it out.

Budd, who looks as fresh as a young American apple, replies, "Ah, I thought you were a little 'on' last night. Eh?" Here he chuckles, and then adds, "I feel a bit chippy myself this morning."

Is it possible that after all my diagnosis, pain over eyes, aching head, unstrung nerves, and hot nose, that I must enter myself in my Diary of Health thus: The — day of — 18— Morning—"A bit chippy"?

Budd whistles to Growler (his brown bear of a dog), who sulks after us at a heavy pace, and we proceed to the West Cliff to the Turkish Baths at the Cramville.

"This," explains Budd. "is the time for going to be washed;"

this is what he calls the Turkish Bath process, and adds, that he invariably comes out at this hour.

Note on Ramsgate Out of Season.—The few people here are as regular in their times as the mechanical figures on a clock, or on an old-fashioned organ. I can tell what time it is on the East or West Cliff, by observing what people are out, weather permitting.

Further Notes on the Out-of-Season Time here.—Observations by Budd and self. There are so few residents, or residing lodgers. [Amendment proposed to Budd by me, "Sojourners,"—which he rejects as being a trifle profane. I assure him it is not so, but he is positive as to having heard the word somewhere in church, and prefers to say "residing lodgers." Note. Better not proceed with discussion. Better to feel, interiorly, superior to prejudice, and say nothing. I feel superior, and we continue our walk and talk.]

There are "residing lodgers" whom one comes to know by sight like the dramatis personæ in a small play.

You seldom see a West-Cliffian on the East Cliff, or an East-Cliffian on the West Cliff. I believe he, or she, would be immediately treated as a trespasser, and, after a few warnings, prosecuted with the utmost rigour of the law.

The houses of the East-Cliffians on Wellington Terrace (or Crescent) are guarded, probably against any incursions of West-Cliffians, by a strong iron railing. Behind this they can breathe defiance at the invader from their dining-room windows. They have a garden railed in, a promenade also railed in, and a part of it, in a corner, so cunningly railed off as to cause a stranger, who sees an East-Cliffian sitting within its boundary, to wonder how on earth he got there. Whether there is a gate to this harbour of refuge, or whether there is a sort of gate, or no gate at all, or whether the East-Cliffians possess the secret of getting through or over the railings, or whether it opens to some secret "Open Sesame!" conjuration, are problems which a visitor will probably never solve, specially if accident of temporary residence identifies him in the least with West-Cliffian interests.

The East Cliff is separated from the West Cliff by a respectable square of the early marine-lodging-house style of architecture; by, also, a worse down-hill road than usual from the respectable square to the town; by the town itself; by (on the west ascent side) a jumble of houses, taken apparently at random from some superfluous lots originally intended (but not used) for villas at Brompton, or St. John's Wood, for a back street at Brighton, or any street in, or about Soho, and placed here to be aired, and get a sniff of the sea.

On the ascent from the town to the West Cliff the visitor (we notice) will pass through a pleasing modulation of scents, varying with the weather.

We are now descending from the West, and going Eastward Ho!

The dramatis personæ, or clockwork figures on the West Cliff, are, first, an old gentleman got up to within an inch of his nose, to resemble the late Duke of Wellington. He is never without a stick, which he shakes playfully at children, and seems to be on terms with everyone, and very good terms too, apparently, with himself. This figure is wound up for an hour and a half's walk in the morning, and wound in again about luncheon time, to reappear (perhaps requiring rather stronger winding this time), at four o'clock in the afternoon; and, the works going down (as it were) with the sun, the Shade of the late Duke disappears for good about six, probably to wind himself up with dinner, wind himself into bed, and wind himself up again the next morning in time for his usual walk.

Secondly, there is the Wild-looking Lady with a fat umbrella—[I dare say it has been once thin, but carelessness has brought it to this state. Mem. Note that. Moral in umbrellas. Why not extract a moral from everything or anything? Why not? Will try]—and a pocket full of tracts. She comes out particularly strong on a bright Sunday. I have never seen her offer the late Duke of Wellington's Shade a tract. I think if she did, he'd waive her off with his stick.

Thirdly, the Young Married Couple, who are always admiring the sea, and examining the horizon together, as if they could see their future somewhere about in the distance.

Fourthly, the Old Married Couple, who sit on a bench for an hour or so before dinner, shake themselves, rise slowly, as if about to walk a minuet, and then retire.

Then come regularly in the afternoon two Elderly Gentlemen, one a vieux militaire en retraite with only his moustache and military stock (no collars) left of his former profession, and the other evidently a civilian. They talk politics loudly and energetically, and, apparently, with the invariable result of "exeunt quarrelling."

There is the Handsome Widow, whom the vieux militaire stops to salute profoundly in the midst of his most animated discussion, and who holds converse sweet and low (in tone, of course, though probably on the most elevated themes) with the gentle High Church Curate, whose large black wide-awake is the nearest approach he can procure to the purely ecclesiastical hat of the Spanish or Belgian priests.

Then there are the learned Benedictines from the Monastery, West Cliff (very unlike "the monks of old, what a jovial race they were!"), who come out with their healthy and happy-looking young collegians at certain hours, and whose church, at the extremity of West Cliff, is one of the late Welby Pugin's gems of Gothic design.

Punctually at three o'clock out come another pair of Elderly Gentlemen (not politicians), who stand still the greater part of their time, pointing out nothing "in the offing," and disputing as to what it isn't.

There are plenty of children, nursery-maids, and dogs.

Finally, there is my Aunt and her dog, with Doddridge in attendance sympathetically. Charlie gives my Aunt much trouble on account of his "affectation" of lameness, and (being led with a string) by his great affability, and apparent desire to be on the best possible terms with other dogs, whether bigger or less than himself.

Charlie has also taken to shivering lately, which my Aunt denounces as "really intolerable affectation," but which Doddridge asserts is a sort of spasm, which to her (Doddridge) is not entirely unknown. Attributing this in her own case to a want of some mysterious and invisible flannel, she has set about to make a sort of miniature jersey, to be worn by Charlie when out for an airing, and not unlike the small horse-cloth used for pet Italian greyhounds.

It is his first day of wearing it, and the fashion attracts the attention of several intelligent dogs. My Aunt walks along—Charlie jerking, growling, barking, and starting—pretending to ignore the pack at her heels, to which Doddridge nervously acts as the whipper-out, with her parasol.

CHAPTER · X.

GROWLER AND CHARLIE — FIGURES — THE VERANDAH — SAMUEL—WANTS SUPPLIED—THE APPEARANCE OF SAMUEL
LE NOIR—LECTURE ON NAYTCHAR—INTENDED TURKISH BATH—IN THE ANTE-ROOM—WHAT NEXT?

BUDD and myself take notice of the miscellaneous procession of dogs behind my Aunt, as we commence our descent, Budd trying to admonish Growler with a gentle kick, that he (Growler) is not to join the performing canine troupe now following my relative.

More Regular Mechanical Figures.—On the East Cliff appears the Pensive and Mysterious Lady in black, taking short walks up and down, and occasional “sits ;” also the Croquet-playing Family who contest vague and unexciting games, within the garden-rails, in any weather. The Foreigner of unwashed aspect, who, for economy’s sake, smokes only half a cigar at a time, and that apparently without lighting it, as no one ever yet has seen smoke issuing from his lips. When he retires, it is believed, he puts the half-cigar into his pocket to be ready for tomorrow’s use on the same principle. Perhaps he is breaking himself of the habit.

We pass these on our road to the Cramville. On the cliff the men are engaged on a work of a very perilous nature, which is nothing less than hacking away the cliff itself and seeing how small a space each man can stand upon without falling over.

The amiable secretary is here, and tells us about the verandah which, owing to him, was built in a fortnight ; which fact he can't get over anyhow. He lights his pipe and stands in front of the hotel, admiring that verandah, as if he personally had put it up all himself, painted it, varnished it, made the iron-work, fitted it up and come down again without any sort of aid or assistance.

Budd asks if Samuel, the bathman, is in, as he and his friend (I'm his friend) wish to commit the enormity of a wash.

The secretary thinks it not unlikely that Samuel is there, it being Samuel's duty to be there, but he won't commit himself to knowing anything about it for certain ; he may be or he may not (all this time he can't take his eyes off the verandah, as if he still saw where some improvement might come in, with perhaps just a dash of paint, put on in a moment of inspiration) but on the whole inclines to the opinion that Samuel is there.

Is there a table d'hôte to-day ? we inquire. After half a minute's thought just to clear his head of the verandah, and get the fresh subject in, the secretary replies, that "there is a table d'hôte, O yes, certainly ;" (and conclusively, now that the verandah has quite gone out and he has grasped the subject)—"yes, a table d'hôte at half-past six."

"You have a good chef here," we observe, Budd or myself, or both.

"Yes," returns the secretary, refilling his pipe and speaking with rather a doubtful air, as if he couldn't quite give his opinion of the chef until he's tried him with everything, "Yes," he admits, "he's not bad," and lights his pipe.

"Will the table be very full to-night ?" is my next question.

The secretary thinks it may be, perhaps, but is generally uninterested—except, as his eyes wander upward once more, fondly, to the verandah. So we leave him, and enter the Cramville, where the Turkish Bath is.

[By the way, everything appears to be obtainable at the Cramville. Do you want billiards?—there you are in the Japanese Gothic room with a phenomenon boy-marker, the Pocket Roberts. Do you want American billiards?—there you are again, with a blue ball and no extra charge. Do you want German or French billiards?—well, perhaps there'll be another table soon. Can't you get on without a sulphur bath?—there you are, or there you will be, when the sulphur comes, the baths being there now. Do you want to bathe in ozone water and lie among the seaweed?—there it is, all ready, with a shower-bath at hand to freshen you up, if the ozone should be too much for you. Do you want to smoke at the top of the house, like a chimney?—there you are, with a flag flying from that part of the roof, to announce your presence. Do you want to dine alone?—do it, in the coffee-room. Do you want to dine in company?—do it again, in the salle-à-manger. Do you want to read or write? or play bowls? or play croquet? or be quiet? or have your hair brushed?—there you are. Do you want a concert after dinner?—there's the concert-room and the music-stands. Do you want a dramatic entertainment?—yes? Very well, then there's a stage, with scenery, lights, and curtain, at the end of the concert-room. This stage, I am informed, was "inaugurated" by an Eminent Entertainist, who, at the end of his performance, took off his wig as a mark of respect to the National Anthem, which he sang by way of carrying out the idea of inauguration. Perhaps he muddled the notion with some reminiscence of "unveiling a statue."]

Budd, followed by the brown-bear dog Growler, walks down a passage, and shouts "Samuel!"

A voice is heard in the distance, which Budd tells me belongs to Samuel, the black man, manager of the Turkish Baths, and shampooer in ordinary to anyone who comes to be shampooed.

We open the door of the first room, and Samuel stands before us. He is a tall coloured gentleman, of the handsomest darkest mahogany dye, dressed in a loose suit of (apparently) red check bed-curtains. He is enthusiastic about the efficacy of the Turkish Bath system in all cases and for everybody, no matter who they are, or what's the matter with them.

Budd introduces me to Samuel, observing that I've "come to pull a little flesh off." Whereupon, Samuel, eyeing me all over, puts his head rather on one side, opens his eyes wide, stretches out his hands in a sort of appealing way, and answers, "Well, he can't"—"a" not being pronounced as ar, but a very broad a)—"he can't do better dan come here to Samuel" (meaning himself). "I'll bring him back to Naytchar"—(meaning "Nature")—"and when he"—(meaning me)—"when he leave me he shall say, 'I'm very much obliged to Samuel.' Dat's it, sar."

[What astonishes me, being accustomed to the conventional Christy, or street-nigger, is, that Samuel shows no sign of joyously giving way to a break-down dance, or bursting out with a "Yah, yah!" nor is his conversation broken up into conundrums.]

Budd laughs, and observes that Samuel will soon put me "in proper form," and asks him if he doesn't think I want it.

Samuel pretends to be astonished at the question. "Want it!" he exclaims. "Want it! Of carse he want it!—Why—look 'yar"—(touching my arms and then my sides, as if explaining me anatomically to Budd)—"look 'yar—and look 'yar—'tain't Naytchar—you don't want all dis"—(alluding to what he considers to be superfluous flesh). "Of carse," he continues, "you're ill : of carse : if you've got all dat about you,"—(here he stretches out his hands on either side, appealingly as before)—"how can you be well ?"

This is exactly what has struck me.

TILL, I am not quite satisfied as to whether a Turkish Bath isn't a dangerous remedy in this climate, specially to-day, as there's an east wind. I put this scientifically to Samuel, to show him that I really am considering the bath medicinally, and have not come merely to lounge.

Note.—Subsequent experience shows me that Turkish Baths are generally taken for the following reasons :—

- 1st, Because it passes a couple of hours away easily.
- 2ndly, Because it gives you an appetite for dinner.
- 3rdly, Because the taker has felt a little "chippy" (as Budd calls it) all day and thinks it will set him right.
- 4thly, Because you've not taken one before, and want to know what it's like.
- 5thly, Because you took one a long time ago, and forget whether you liked it or not.
- 6thly, Because the one you had a year since didn't agree with you, but you rather think it was your fault, so you're going to give it another chance.

7thly, Because the one you had the other day didn't do any good, and you were told that it's the second which is really beneficial.

8thly, Because the first Turkish Bath you had agreed with you wonderfully.

9thly, Because you've been saying you'll take one for the last two years, and haven't had time.

10thly Because you like it.

11thly, Because you don't like it, but think it will do you good.

12thly, Because another fellow takes it regularly, and wants you to go with him.

13thly, Because your doctor thinks it's a capital thing.

14thly, Because your doctor says it's the worst thing possible, and you want to show him he's wrong.

15thly, Because it's a wet day, and you might as well be in a Turkish Bath as anywhere else—better.

16thly, Because it's a fine day, just the day for a bath.

17thly, Because it's a hot day, and you want to get cool.

18thly, Because it's a cold day, and you want to get hot.

And so on.

I object to the bath to-day, because of the east wind.

"East wind!" repeats Samuel, opening his eyes and mouth, and stretching out his hands, as if he were playing at fives, and expected to hit the ball next time. "East wind!" here he half turns away, chuckles at the absurdity of the idea, and then faces us again. "What's de east wind? Why—it's de very day to take a bath! Dere wouldn't be no test for de bath if it weren't for de east wind!"

"But," I say, "I may catch cold on leaving, and must wrap up." Samuel smiles pityingly, and looks from me to Budd, then back again at me, then once more at Budd. Then he finds words: "Why," he says, almost plaintively, "if you wrap up, what's de good of coming to me?" This is the first time I've heard anything like a conundrum from him. "Don't say, if you're ill afterwards, it's de bath; don't blame Samuel. No; it's de fault of de wrapping up. Dere, sar," he adds, with the air of putting a thorough poser, and settling the question once and for ever, "Look at me!" I do. "Wa-al, where am I all de day?" [Ah! another conundrum.] "Ain't I in bath, den out? Do I wrap up?" [These have been, as it were, a series of conundrums.] Indignantly, "No!" Pause. Then he calms down, and finishes up with his usual, "Well, den, you trust to Samuel (himself) and he see you all right."

[Mem: subsequently. Another day I ask him—"Bad day, Samuel, for bath, so cold, north wind too." He replies, "Dere! hear dat! Well," as if in utter amazement at the absurdity of my objection, "Well, I am astonished! An' you an eddicated gentleman! Why de north wind!!! Why, it de very day for a Turkish Bath," and he seems to be so shocked and hurt that one feels compelled to take a bath in order to console him. But he can't get over it all the time I'm there, until he's finished with me, and I tell him I feel better, when he brightens up, and says, "Dere! didn't I tell you so. Trust Samuel, he never tell a lie—it just de very day for a bath." And so on, whatever the weather may be.]

Samuel retires. We are in a light and airy room of Gothic style, with a plunge sea-water bath at one side of it under a skylight. There are several neat-looking beds, or rather pallets, ranged lengthways on either side, giving the room a sort of private hospital appearance, or perhaps (taking the Gothic character into consideration) the infirmatorial department of a somewhat luxurious monastery. The religious tone of the place is heightened by the introduction of stained glass, and by the little dressing cabins for the "plungers," which remind one of the open confessionals seen in Catholic churches. Quite primitive notion. Confession first, and baptism by immersion afterwards, with a swim.

Growler has followed Budd into the room, and sulkily takes up a position under a bed. We prepare for the bath. First stage, the acrobatic.

Hot Room, Number One. Flash of thought; take care of Number One. I will. Red brick walls. Stained glass windows of a kaleidoscopic pattern, very dangerous to biliousness and headaches. There is a large marble slab, like the front of a fishmonger's shop, only not sloping on one side, where Budd says, "the patients can lie." Somehow his use of the word "patient" grates upon me. The marble slab, too, suggests—but, no—this must be repressed. I am simply nervous, the effects of my Aunt, Doddridge, Turtle-dove, & Co.

I feel that my head is getting hot and dry, and my feet cold. I mention this to Budd, as an experienced man. He replies, "Ah! yes! they do sometimes." "But," I ask, "is that right?" being anxious. He answers in an off-hand manner (not being the least nervous or unwell himself), that he doesn't think it matters. It suddenly occurs to Budd that he oughtn't to have left Growler in the first room under the bed, because of people coming in.

"Why? what would he do?" I ask, having hitherto looked upon Growler as harmless, only of a sulky demeanour.

"Why," he answers ruminatingly, "he's inclined to be stupid with strangers."

I inquire in what way he shows his "stupidity?" It appears, from Budd's reply, that Growler's "stupidity with strangers" develops itself in a tendency towards strangers' calves. I inquire, in case I have to go into the room alone, whether there is any chance of Growler being "stupid" with me.

"Well," Budd says, "in that undress I don't know." He alludes to my present acrobatic appearance. "He mightn't make you quite out." Then I won't go in there alone.

"No," returns Budd; "I wouldn't, if I were you—better not."

"But," I add, "those sort of dogs are so intelligent; he's seen me often with you, and he'd probably know my voice."

"Yes," returns Budd, standing in the doorway which leads to Hotter Room, "he'd know your voice if he could hear it, but the old boy's as deaf as a post, and, you see, it's that makes him rather stupid with strangers." With which he disappears into Hot Room, Number Two.

I am gradually becoming accustomed to the atmosphere: being "acclimatised," as it were. My hair feels to my touch like grass after three weeks scorching sun in July. I wish Samuel would come and watch me to see how I'm getting on. Being all alone is unpleasant and a trifle dangerous. I might frizzle up suddenly or faint. Budd is, as far as I know, out of call, and I couldn't run into the hot room for help, which would be out of the frying-pan (first room) into the fire (second room), and in the only cool room, where we commenced, is Growler, who, being deaf, won't "quite make me out," and will probably be "stupid" with me, as a stranger. Whatever may be the ultimate result, at present I am drying up.

I feel dry all over ; parched. I want my pocket-handkerchief. It is in the first room. Let me see, if I go back into the first room without medical advice, or Samuel's advice, I may, perhaps, get a chill and send myself all wrong. And again recurs to me—only more strongly—the just-mentioned want of intellect on the part of that Beast. On the whole better stay where I am. Why doesn't Samuel come and see how I am getting on? A novice oughtn't to be left alone. Supposing I was to faint suddenly, or Ah ! here is Samuel.

How does he think I am getting on?

He is in ecstasy with my progress. He spreads out his hands and opens his eyes. "O, beautiful !" he exclaims ; " beautiful ! dat," he says, alluding to my present state, " dat's what I call Naytchar." So do I to a certain extent. I complain of being dry, generally ; of my hair being dry particularly.

Samuel is quite annoyed ; for a few seconds he really can't speak. He is, apparently, so very much put out by my evident ingratitude towards " Naytchar," and himself.

" Why," he says, when he has recovered himself, " Gracious Goodness !" rolling his head from side to side, and as usual extending his hands, palms flat out, like fins, " Ain't dat de verry ting you come 'ere for? You leave it to me ;" then, appealingly, to my common sense, "'tain't no good for me to tell you a lie, sar, is it?" Being rather afraid of making him angry, though I think if I was in full dress, I shouldn't be in the least nervous, but, as I am, I feel as it were out of my element, (clothes being, when I consider it, my element) and that he'd have the advantage of me—I admit that he is right, and that to tell me, or any one else, in my present helpless condition, a lie, would not only be of no use to him, but would (I feel and hope he does so, too) be an act of positive cruelty.

[Mem. Wonder if Shakspeare drew his Othello from a Samuel of his time. Quotation. "I took the Turk by the throat"—no, not exactly—but head not clear just at present.]

Samuel tells me to wait a few minutes longer here, and then I can join the Captain (Budd) who is, he says, "gettin' on, O, beautiful, beautiful, in de hot room. Why de Captain get on beautiful?" he asks suddenly, as a conundrum. I don't know. I give it up. "Wa-al," he replies, laying down the moral with his right hand, "Wa-al, 'cos de Captain do jist 'zactly what I tell him. You trust to Samuel, an' he won't tell you a lie."

He really appears so hurt that I feel as if I'd been doing nothing else but accusing him of mendacity since I came here.

A knock at the outer door!

AMUEL summoned. Short conversation without.
Re-enter Samuel. He comes up to me persuasively,
"You won't mind, sar, two genelmen seeing over dis place?"

I reply (being in his hands) "O no, certainly not ;'
though I don't feel that I'm precisely in the state in which'
I should like to receive visitors. It appears, however, that the Turkish Baths are a novelty here, and strangers, or residents, are admitted to view them.

Samuel explains the room to them, and takes me as part of it. I remember going over a Lunatic Asylum once, and a gaol, and wondering how the comparatively-sensible lunatics and the prisoners liked being shown off. I fancy that I experience their sensation now. Rather I should say the lunatic's sensation,—one who has destroyed all his clothes, and has been placed in a room by himself. I don't experience shyness exactly, but feel sulkily resentful at this intrusion. They don't quite ignore me; on the contrary, they stand near the door, hardly going away from it, as if afraid of my making a sudden dart at them, perhaps for the sake of their clothes and boots, when Samuel isn't looking, and, at this respectful distance, they give a sort of half bow to me, as if they were calling upon a gentlemanly maniac of uncertain temper, or had been admitted by Samuel, into the den of a partially-tamed animal, unsafe except under the keeper's eye. Mem. The idea occurs to me, perhaps one of these visitors is Mr. Darwin in search of evidence corroborative of his theory. Unpleasant.

Mem. Think I've read of a hermit, near Cambridge, who had to be "interviewed" in this way. There seems, too, to be the ingredients for a Historical Romance in this situation. "The Man in the Turkish Bath," like "The Man in the Iron Mask." Head very hot. Wish I could get my note-book in here. Left it in first room—can't return for it, on account of Growler's "stupidity with strangers."

The "Genelmen" retire, inclining towards me very civilly on their exit. I do the honours of the first hot-room as well as I can. Samuel returns, and brings me a glass of mineral water. Iron. "Is that a good thing?" I inquire. "De best thing possible," answers Samuel. "What's its effect?" I ask, holding the glass in my hand. Mem. Simile: Socrates putting a few scientific questions to the gaoler before taking the fatal draught.

"You drink that, sar," replies Samuel, "and it make you all fresh for de next room, den you go in and jist do what I tell you, and take your time over it, 'cos, dat's what I say, you genelmen, do what you like, you need not hurry; you enjoy," he pronounces "enjoy," "de bath. You put yourself in de state for Naytchar to act; you give Naytchar a chance, and you bless Providence you come 'ere. You take my word for it, sar—now, sar," says he, drawing back a red-baize curtain, as if he was going to show me a real chef d'œuvre, "You walk in dere! proceed!"

I enter the hotter room: it nearly knocks me down at first. On recovering myself a little, I find it is like a very clean wine-cellar, without bins, having a sort of opaque Gothic screen, with intervals of kaleidoscope-coloured glass on one side, and fitted (the cellar, not the screen) with a narrow sort of dresser fixed against the side walls. Here in a corner lies Budd on a mattress, prostrate, an appalling figure at first (reminding me of Cruikshank's illustrations to the Tower of London—"Somebody, as he appeared after the rack") until one gets accustomed to him, and then I begin to understand that he is enjoying himself, tropically.

Samuel places a mattress and a pillow for me; motions me statuesquely to my place.

Budd, without moving in the least, utters a sort of pleased sound; implying, I fancy, that in spite of his present condition he recognises us and appreciates my progress.

Samuel approaches him; he regards him as a work of his own hands with profound admiration, nay even with an appearance of religious veneration for "Naytchar" in a Paradise of 160 degrees, and drawing a deep breath, exclaims, "Ah, beautiful!"

Budd appears pleased, and intimates briefly his intention of remaining where he is, until inclined to take the douche or the needle.

I am reclining now, and feel that I am all Head. Or perhaps —if I can exert myself to think at all about it—that my head is Central Africa under a burning sun, and my feet are the North Pole at night. . . . Too languid to ask about needles or douches. . . . Lie on my back—look at ceiling. . . .

Thoughts, or beginnings of trains of thoughts (while recumbent at 160° in the shade). Early Christian Martyrs. . . . I hear a noise and a roaring—Christianos ad leones! . . . Good practice here for beginners. . . . Noise of engine, as if we were going somewhere by steam. . . . Wonder if I shall be ill. . . . Wonder why I am not in a profuse perspiration. . . . Shall I mention it? . . . no. . . . Hair brittle. . . . Enter Samuel, with more water. . . . I drink. . . . Samuel only says, “O beautiful! it’s Naytchar!” . . . I complain of my feet being cold.

“I wouldn’t hab it no oderwise,” replies Samuel, seriously, waving his right hand as if to dissipate any other notions on the subject that may be floating about in the air, “Wait till I come to shampoo, den you’ll know what de beauty ob it is.” He retires.

Thoughts. My Aunt . . . Doddridge . . . the Dove . . . Will recommend them a Turkish Bath. . . . Might do little dog’s leg good . . . take the affectation out of him. . . . Must manage to get away. . . . Look at Budd. . . . He smiles and I smile. . . . Think of when I knew him years ago as a boy. . . . Think of the ceiling . . . the bricks . . . how impossible it is to do anything in this state. . . . Query, is it waste of time, or not? . . . Can’t I think out something? . . . Bruce and spider . . . a poem . . . a play . . . an invention to . . . to . . . do something wonderful . . . thoughts chiefly on ceiling . . . engine what rhymes to Shampoo? . . . woo—Jew . . . a rhyme occurs to me (vaguely)

The Wandering Jew?

Nothing more occurs to me . . . then round of thought all over again about martyrs, St. Lawrence, &c., &c.

Wonder if Budd feels this? I mean feels that he can't concentrate his thoughts on any one thing now? I ask him. He answers, "Don't know—don't try," and seems, on the whole, perfectly satisfied with inanition.

I will do the same. . . . I am doing the same. . . . Enter Samuel, without his bed-curtain dress, and in an acrobatic costume, like ours. He carries a little bowl of water, and evidently means business. He approaches me.

He refreshes me with a bowl of water, emptying it over my head. Delicious. He jerks my arms, cracks my joints. I am helpless. He plays tunes with his fists all over me. When sufficiently pummelled and jerked, I am led out tenderly, by Samuel, into another room. I remember (at this instant) having heard the Clown say to the Pantaloon in the pantomime, "Hallo, here! hi! I say! come and be washed!" This is what, in action, Samuel says to me.

Then follows a charmingly refreshing process, managed exquisitely, and scientifically, by Samuel. I sit on a chair and have water dashed over me. I am soaped and lathered, and while I am trying to open my eyes, down come the contents of another bowl of water right over me. "Naytchar" is gasping. I am put into a sort of cage, standing, and am enervated by a shower of tepid water, revived by an avalanche of cold water from above, braced up by cold water from the sides, from round the corner, from in fact all sorts of places whence you'd least expect it.

I clutch the rails of my cage, convulsively; more gasping. Through the mist of the spray I see Samuel with a hose, as if he were putting me out. I try to say, "Hi! that's enough!" But I can't, and, as he thinks I am enjoying myself immensely, he gives me some more. Niagara all over, and round and round. . . . He stops . . . I recover my breath . . . gasping over . . . I feel invigorated, inclined to shout, to spring up, to dance. One more turn, a thousand watering-pots are pointing their very small bore roses at me, and, as it were, pricking me all over. This is the Needle. Then I am told to "pro-ceed" by Samuel, and am directed to step under a round iron ring.

More cold water. A chest expander. Here I could stop for some time longer, but Samuel won't hear of it. So I am hurried away by Samuel, rubbed over, wrapped up in a sheet, which he picturesquely folds over my shoulders, and am finished off ("This style complete") with a turban, which he skilfully winds round my head.

He leads me to Room No. 1, shows me a pallet, places me comfortably, leaves me to the most soothing influences of a semi-dozing state and a cigarette, and returns in about five minutes, or more (but time does go at such a pace in a Turkish Bath), with Budd costumed in the same style—Mahommedans both. Samuel is right, so far, at all events. I do thank him; I haven't felt so well for an age as I do now. I experience a sort of buoyant feeling, so that, if I could be transported to our house, at once, I could dance round my Aunt, kick the bird-cage into a corner, pull the dog's tail, and do a polka with Doddridge.

Mem. "So well, now." As I made this note in my pocket-book, I am lying on the pallet and gradually becoming so hungry that I would dine here, on the spot, at once, but for the shock my absence would cause my Aunt.

Samuel is right when he exclaims, "Beautiful! Beautiful!"

IN the whole, I am much benefited by Turkish Baths. How much? To the extent, at present, of one sovereign. The way to value the amount of good done, is to compare in parallel lines the number of Turkish Baths taken in a week, with the quantity of medicine I might have had for the same money.

Say, on one side, one pound's worth of Turkish B's.

On the other side, one pound's worth of medicines.

There can be no doubt that four Turkish Baths representing twelve days, I couldn't, unless the doses had been very expensive, —old, dry, for example, twenty years in bottle, and "round in the mouth,"—I couldn't have had my money's worth out of them in the same time. Probably, if I'd ventured upon that enormity, I should have been, as Budd puts it, a dead 'un.

My appetite and drinkatite are, comparatively, enormous. I am constantly apologising to my Aunt for keeping her so long at dinner or luncheon.

Her observation to-day struck me as having something in it. It was—"In some people a large appetite is a most unhealthy sign."

Question. Have I suddenly gone to an extreme?

Diagnosis. Tuesday. Headache slight. Hot nose; and, undoubtedly, slightly red. Appetite up to (as it were) 190 in the shade, i.e., without exercise. My Aunt sighs and shakes her head. She is of opinion that my coming with an apology three times for roast mutton is unnatural. At first she was inclined to set it down to "affectation."

Fourth Diagnosis. Wednesday. Intense sleepiness. Loss of appetite between breakfast and luncheon, but sudden return of same, with increased power, at 1'30. Mustn't take anything now, as it's T. B. day. Pouring wet. Samuel says, "Just the day for a Bath; couldn't be better." Evening. Faint with hunger before dinner. Sleepiness after dinner, when my Aunt is uncommonly lively in her own way; i.e., she sings three of her most melancholy songs—O do not Leave me! My Heart is Weary! O let me Die! and thoroughly wakes me up by bursting into tears over the last-mentioned, when I have to ring for Doddridge to bring my Aunt's pocket-handkerchief, which is almost immediately afterwards discovered behind the sofa-cushion.

Then, when my Aunt is going to retire for the night, irrepressible wakefulness sets in with me, which she remarking, more in sorrow than in anger, cannot help observing, that "she is but dull company for me;" to which politeness requires me to answer, "O no, not at all," and that she is afraid she depresses me; to which again politeness and a certain amount of policy compel me to reply that "On the contrary, I—" when I finish, feeling that my acting is not up to the occasion. She continues that she is sure I must be glad to get rid of her; whereupon I try to return with effusion, as the French say, "Get rid of you, my dear Aunt, why I'm sure that—" But once again I come to a standstill by the ingenuousness of my nature, which is at this moment a nuisance, as I should like to be sympathetic, and—if one could in private life—deliver a speech in blank verse, expressive of how much I don't want to get rid of my Aunt, and how immensely her songs, her presence, and her manner generally are calculated to cheer me.

I think I manage to look hurt at her imputation, but, somehow or another, I equally feel that a smile is pulling up one corner of my mouth, as Doddridge enters with the candle, and exclaims (the toadie!) "O, Master George! how can you!" as if I'd hit my Aunt, or been rude to her. And so she leads her up-stairs to bed. When they've gone I find myself clenching my fist and saying, "Confound it! I never—" and here the Dove in her cage says Coo-coo-oo exactly nine times, very slowly, and bowing to me each repetition.

I do not get on with my Aunt. I really should like to for various reasons, some being of genuine importance. I cannot, I've tried it, and failed, and am still trying it. I cannot sympathise with the little snappish King Charles and the monotonous Dove. Perhaps a return of health, through the agency of the Turkish Baths at the Cramville, makes me irritable, or, more properly speaking, impatient.

I know I should please my Aunt immensely—at least, I believe so—if I nursed Charlie for two hours regularly, and said that I liked his new collar with six bells all tinkling at once.

I object, too, to being obliged, as it were, to share my meals with Charlie. His dinner-hour is our dinner-hour, his breakfast-time is our breakfast time, and so on. From the moment we sit down he commences a series of spasmodic yelps, enough to derange the stoutest nerves; though my Aunt and Doddridge only allude to the horrid noise with rapture, as "almost speaking, isn't it? Dear little Char'!"

"He's quite like a child, ain't he, Mum?" exclaims Doddridge, admiringly. "Do give him that little bit on your plate, Master George."

All my little bits go to Charlie. I like little bits myself; keeping a reserve of them.

My Aunt has discovered that Charlie has an ear for music. Doddridge (the sycophant!) exclaims, rapturously, "He almost sings to you, don't he, Mum? Don't he, Master George?"

I say (being disturbed in reading Ketzler On Idiosyncratic Induction), "Yes, almost sings," and wish that he'd quite sing instead of setting up the most dismal howl I ever heard, as an accompaniment to my Aunt's most cheerful ballad, Longing to Die.

Keeping my eyes on my book (like "the good St. Anthony," only for a different reason), I meditate upon the quickest and best means of getting away from my Aunt and Ramsgate. Let me see, or rather let me consider—while pretending to read—

Philosophical and Psychological Note.—Complex faculties, negative and positive.

(a) I am reading with my eyes, and a few sentences disjointedly get mixed up with my (b) thoughts on quite a different subject, namely, how to break off (as it were) my connection with my Aunt, while (c) my ears are trying to close themselves to the sounds of my Aunt's singing, Charlie's howling, and the piano, and Doddridge's laudatory ejaculations.

I have heard of a philosophical writer who could compose his most serious and most successful essays while the junior members of his family were blowing trumpets, beating drums, and fighting, the elder branches talking and laughing, and his wife bothering him about what he'd like for dinner. Wonderful. I recollect mentioning this to a Thinker of my acquaintance, who replied, "Concentrate yourself. You'll soon get accustomed to it." I am now trying to concentrate myself. Note result for future psychological analysis.

[Also, Note by the way. What a fine profession a Thinker's might be. Say two thousand a year to Think, only to Think, not to speak, or write, or to do anything. And then at the end of a term, say three years, see what came of it. Your employers could then decide upon retaining you or not.]

My Thoughts. If I could only get some one to send me a line—Lines in book that come in here—"The desolating system of empiricism" . . . (eyes wander) . . . "innate à priori perceptions" (thoughts continued)—some one might send me a pressing invitation.

My Aunt's voice (plaintively)—

Weary, so weary ! so weary !
Break ! break my heart with a sigh.

"Sigh" is a very high note ; dog howls ; Aunt prolongs note ! dog prolongs howl.

Doddridge (rapturously). Ain't he wonderful, Mum ?

Piano accompaniment—chords. (Thoughts) I wish that dog was—I wish that Doddridge—no—let me concentrate myself—let me see—if somebody sends me an invitation to say—(book again)—"synthetical judgments . . . as deducible . . . and cognisable . . . entities"—dear me—this will never do—I really must concentrate . . .

My Aunt, in a broken voice, being much touched by her own rendering of the song—

Dreary ! so dreary ! so dreary !

My Aunt (gulpingly)—

Dreary ! so (very feelingly) dreary ! so (most feelingly) dreary !

I know this will end in tears . . . I wish I could thoroughly concentrate myself now, and pretend to be absorbed.

[Piano. Forcible chord.

Waiting ! O wai—ting——

Here my Aunt (I can't help attending to her) goes down several steps (so to speak) in a minor key, evidently feeling the sentiment more and more deeply, so that one almost expects her to turn to Doddridge, and exclaim with the last note, "Plunge a Dagger into me ; I don't want to live any more after this song : please do it, and oblige yours truly, &c." My Aunt is now joined by Charlie, with his nose in the air—

Waiting, O waiting ! and weary !

Longing—(with fervour)—O longing . . . to . . . (long note, as if to make the next word, when it DOES come at last, an agreeable surprise) . . .

o . . o . . [Same note. Dog and Aunt both hold it.
o . . o . . die !!!

Result. Doddridge weeps, my Aunt catches Charlie in her arms, and sobs convulsively.

What can I say ? What can I do ? I feel that, to sit still, is almost brutal. I am hot, uncomfortable, feverish. This sort of thing will quite counteract all the good of the Turkish Baths.

I must say something . . . I do. I say, in as gentle a tone as possible, "Aunt, shall I get you your pocket-handkerchief?" No answer. I rise. Knock at door. Enormous Housemaid (the third new one since we've been here, each one bigger than the former, and all quite Life Guardsmen in petticoats) brings a letter for my Aunt. Perhaps this will assist me, and I shall be able to leave.

Letter to inform my Aunt that my Cousin John, from sea, has got a few days' leave, and is coming to see her. Then I can go. I will just stop to meet him and then go.

Note in Valetudinarian Diary. I think I am thinner. Sometimes I fancy I'm not. It seems to me that I vary with the day. Last Monday I seemed to be stouter than usual. On Tuesday I seem to have gone down again. Odd. "Here to-day, and gone to-morrow."

Night. As I am lying awake—(somehow I do a great deal of lying awake now—when I tell Samuel this, and attribute it to the Turkish Baths, he exclaims, with open eyes and hands, "Well, Sar, why not?" and as I have no answer to this form of conundrum, he continues, almost angrily, "You don't want so much sleep—it's not Naytchar"—but I don't think I quite agree with Samuel on this point)—I think why it is I don't get on better with my Aunt? Also wonder how my Cousin John from sea will get on with her. Shall see.

Y Cousin John From Sea has arrived, and we've had a day of him. I retire to my room to meditate, principally on Cousin John From Sea, and make this note.

John is, undoubtedly, I am obliged to own it, a success. I mean as regards my Aunt and Doddridge. Not with me; because, though I admit that he is tall, handsome, with a genial manner, yet I do not like boisterosity, by which I mean a person's being perpetually boisterous. This is the very last thing I should have tried with my Aunt. John doesn't try it; he comes, does it, and conquers. Here have I been with my Aunt for weeks at Ramsgate, during the most unfashionable and unseasonable time, adapting myself not only to her peculiarities, but to those of Doddridge, her maid, her ring-dove and her lap-dog with bells, listening sympathetically to her music, trying to weep, nay, sometimes weeping when she wept, controlling my temper and reducing myself to a fearfully nervous state of repressed irritability, refusing to drive out with Budd (except once), and, in fact, making myself in a general way, as it were, "one of themselves," and at the end of the time I feel that there is a gulf between my Aunt and myself; that we, as it were, form two comparatively hostile camps, one containing my Aunt (generalissimo), Doddridge, Dove and Dog; and the other myself, in anything but full force. I have tried to suit my conversation to my company; I have been mildly cheerful, I have been serious, I have been quakerishly gay, I have suppressed anything like untimely mirth, and am evidently quite unappreciated, perhaps regarded as a nuisance. John arrives. Tremendous knock. Rushes down the passage. Runs into sitting-room, gives my Aunt a slap on the back and a kiss, and says "Hallo, old gal!"

She doesn't jump, scream, kick, nor indeed appear the least surprised. If I had done such a thing, she'd have burst into lavish tears and—but there—I couldn't have done it.

Query. Shall I begin a new line now and try?

"Hallo, old Doddy!" he cries, on the appearance of that respectable maiden, Doddridge, who quite beams under the salutation and replies, "O, Master John, you're just as bad as ever, I do declare."

My Cousin John From Sea addresses both my Aunt and Doddridge as "old gal," and has a great deal to say about flagships, the Mediterranean, Gibraltar, the fellows at mess, and has apparently endless stories of the fun they had wherever they were stationed.

Getting John quiet, I try to obtain from him some information as to naval matters, as for instance, watches at sea, keeping look-out, to what rank in the Army a boatswain is equivalent, also questions concerning hammocks, cabooses, and the general domestic economy of a ship, with which as a landsman I confess myself totally unacquainted.

Strange to say that if there is one thing about which Cousin John From Sea appears to know nothing, it is about ships, shipping, and naval and marine affairs generally. He has no stories about Saturday night at sea, and how they sit round the galley fire and sing and dance to the music of the black cook's fiddle. He (Cousin John, I mean) has not been all over the world, and lived a roving seafaring life, but, on the contrary, all his stories of the fun he has had might be told by a country squire who has never gone out of his own inland county, or by a Londoner who has invariably kept within hearing of Bow Bells. (Query. Can Bow bells be heard in St. James's Street, Bond Street, or Belgravia? If not, what are the exact limits?)

Cousin John's being at sea is, to my mind, a humbug. He's always been, by his own showing, on shore.

He begins a story with, "When we were in the Mediterranean." Then he turns towards me, and explains, "We were in the Mediterranean for three years"—and I nod encouragingly, as much as to say, "Proceed; your story interests me much;" for I am expecting to hear some fearful tale of shipwreck, or some gallant adventure with pirates, or large fish, or whatever there may be unusual or startling during a three years' cruise about the Mediterranean. But not a bit of it. His story (addressed to my Aunt, who is much interested, and quite sprightly) generally continues in this style: "I met the Curzons." Not shot an albatross, or engaged with buccaneers, or suppressed a mutiny by craftily securing all the ruffians under hatches, and then steering the ship by himself for nights and days, until she came safely into port, where he had all the crew hung. No, nothing of that sort, but simply, "When he (Cousin John From Sea) was in the Mediterranean . . . he met the Curzons!!" Just as he might have done in Hyde Park or Pall Mall on any one day, that is, provided always that the Curzons were there, and not in the Mediterranean. My Aunt is, however, quite delighted, and immediately asks after various members of the Curzon family.

As I can't believe that this sums up the entire events of three years in the Mediterranean—(Note, because, if so, Cousin John had better write Annals of an Uneventful Life, in one very small volume, price sixpence at most)—I try to draw him out, when my Aunt has finished her examination about the Curzons, and remind him that "he was saying 'When he was in the Mediterranean'—well, what then?"

"It became rather slow at last," he replies, "but we had some good fun. Of course we were rather hard up for hunting in the winter, but we got some good shooting, and there were dinners and balls and parties every day in the week, until one was really quite sick of them."

"You hunt much?" I hazard, because I had always thought that a sailor on horseback was an impossibility or an utter absurdity.

"Yes," he replies, in an off-hand way, "I had a bad time of it last season, because I'd sold Old Tantrum. You recollect Old Tantrum?" he says, turning to my Aunt. She does, and smiles as if much gratified at being appealed to on such a question.

"I say, old gal," he suddenly exclaims; jumping up, "let's have a drive this afternoon. I'll get a trap and take you out.

You want a jolt, it'll do you good. We'll have a dog-cart, and you" (to me) "can hold Doddy on behind."

Whereat Doddy simpers, and says, "Lor ! how you do go on, Master John !"

The next thing John wants to know is, "If there ain't any nice young women—present company always excepted," he says, winking at me (more simpers from my Aunt this time, and Doddridge chuckling)—"who'd like to have a hop in the evening? I say, old gal," he continues, sitting down on the sofa, and putting his arm round my Aunt, "we must have a hop," and he actually induces my Aunt to enter into a discussion on the subject.

I notice that he uses the word hop to my Aunt, who shows no signs of fainting. So that not all words that end in "op" affect her, as I had begun to think they did. But really it seems that Cousin John, because he's come from sea, may say anything.

He pretends to run up-stairs after Doddridge in order to give her a kiss. He asks my Aunt for a song, and she "obliges" with Longing to Die, which Cousin John immediately characterises as "a cheery sort of ditty," and asks her if she doesn't know anything a trifle more dismal. She is not in the least annoyed ; on the contrary, she tries to recollect something lively, but fails. He asks her to accompany him in a nigger song with some such inane chorus as "Flip up in de Skidamajink, jube up in de juben jube," and proposes to teach Doddridge the bones. Charlie, hearing the music, begins howling, whereupon Cousin John's attention being thus attracted to him, he takes him suddenly up by the tail, to see, he says, if he's thoroughbred ; as if he is, he won't squeal. He is evidently not thoroughbred. All my Aunt says to him is, "O, John, you'll hurt him," whereas if I'd touched a hair of his tail, or had refused to give him a tit-bit, my Aunt would have burst into tears, perhaps had a fit, Doddridge would have sobbingly reproached me with unkindness to my Aunt, and I should have been made nervous and wretched for an hour at least, but Cousin John From Sea may smoke, vault over the table (he actually does so), play leapfrog over the chairs (which he also does whenever he says he thinks we're a little dull, and want waking up, generally inviting Doddridge to give him a back), smack my Aunt, punch my Aunt, laugh at her songs, make her pet dog squeak with rage, let the dove out of the cage to walk about (when it flies to the mantel-piece and breaks an ornament), and not only is nothing said to him by way of remonstrance, but he is absolutely encouraged by my Aunt's smiles, and Doddridge's admiring exclamations of "Ain't he lively, Mum?" "O, Master John, how you do go on!"

I am certainly in the background. I at once take rank as it were after—or rather some way below—Cousin John, and begin looking up to him. He is bent upon taking the "old gals" out for a drive, and so I accompany him into the town to the Livery Stables, to ask for a trap and two ponies.

Thoughts as I walk along by the side of Cousin John.—Odd. He was so noisy in the house, that I thought he'd be a charming companion here, when he had dropped his nonsensical humour, which I take for granted he has assumed just to enliven my Aunt with a little buffoonery. Now we are alone, he will be sensible. He can inform me what the ships are out at sea. [N.B. That's the beauty of Ramsgate, such a heap of shipping. There's always a steamer or two going out or coming in on its own account, or assisting other vessels to come in or get out; then there's the Life Boat, gallantly manned, and always ready for action in the direction of the fatal Goodwins: also fishing boats and yachts, and little boats for rowing, or little boats for sailing, and so on. But it greatly adds to the interest if you've got some one to explain all this to you,—like, for instance, my Cousin John, who, being from sea, I may look upon as a professional person with peculiar knowledge.]

He is quite silent. I ask him, "What is that?" pointing to a vessel which has just come in. He doesn't know what she is. He can't make her out, he says, and then relapses into silence, and we walk on. "I suppose," I say, presently, "that the Mediterranean is very beautiful?" "Yes," he replies, doubtfully, as if he'd never considered it in this light before, and hadn't made up his mind. [By the way, I can't help remarking that he is dressed in the height of the present fashion, and isn't one bit like any sailor I ever saw.] I tell him I want to go to the library to order a book. "Ah!" he says, "you're always reading, ain't you?" To which I reply, modestly, "No, not always." I suppose this is the character he's heard of me. He continues "I'm not much of a bookist, so I'll just pop into the stables close by, and you come on."

We part. On the steps of the library I suddenly feel a sort of shooting pain from my shoulder to my elbow, and an ache in my knee. By the way, Cousin John's visit has brought under my notice something which I have not remarked in myself before. He can run up the steps of our cliff without stopping once, and then walk briskly on. I can't. I have to pause three times (generally on pretence of admiring the view), and rather feel as if I'd swallowed a new loaf whole when I get to the top. And yet I am thinner—I must be thinner.

At this moment somebody below me calls me by name. I turn, and meet Wetherby. "Thin!" he exclaims, in answer to my inquiry upon that point. "No, I don't notice it. But you're not looking well."

In ten minutes it is settled that change of air will do me good—that a blow on "the briny" will be the thing for me, in Wetherby's yacht. An opportunity for gracefully taking leave of my Aunt and Ramsgate, and leaving her and Doddridge—the "old gals,"—to My Cousin John From Sea.

CHAPTER XV.

THE time approaches when I must take leave of my Aunt. I regret this, as Samuel informs me that "Now de season come on, sar, it just de very weather for a bath. Never is such a time for Naytchar as de summer, sar. But, dar," he adds, resignedly, "dat's just de way wid you gentlemen—edicated gentlemen, as I'd ha' thought 'ad known better—they go away just when de bath begin to do 'em good. Don't say," he concludes, with most impressive earnestness, "don't say when you go away and get ill, and have de cold and de cramp and de rheumatiz—don't say that it's Samuel's fault; that's all." This condition is a sort of stipulation which he insists upon, in order to bring himself, as it were, to even the most unwilling agreement to my departure.

I foresee that saying farewell to my Aunt will be painful. There will be a scene. Perhaps she'll regret me when I'm away. If Cousin John From Sea only stops long enough, and slaps her sufficiently on the back, I'm sure she will. To be slapped on the back may be all very well for a few days, as a novelty, but I think she'll tire of it in a fortnight.

I am particularly kind—making a point of it—to Charlie, the lap-dog, during my last hours here. I give him almond-biscuits and cream. He immediately acquires a taste for these luxuries, and in our absence he makes himself master of the contents of the biscuit-tin and cream-jug on the table. The consequence is, that he is seized with a dreadful attack of biliousness ; he lies on the sofa (when I enter to say good-bye) gasping, and my Aunt and Doddridge are kneeling by his side.

"O Master George !" exclaims the handmaiden—I swear there never was such a sycophant as Old Doddridge, for I believe she really hates the dog, as her rival in my Aunt's affections, and I dare say is now secretly hoping that she is witnessing the last of Charlie—"How could you be so cruel?"

Cousin John coming in by the window—(Note on Cousin John—if there is any mode of entrance except the door, I observe he will always enter by it—here he's got a choice of three windows, and my Aunt is never startled by his unexpected appearance, as she would be by mine)—has a remedy for Charlie at once. He'll "set him all right," he says, "in two twos. Come up, you little warmint !" With which he takes up the little "warmint" by the scruff of his neck (which must be most unpleasant, yet neither of the "Old Gals" remonstrate), and carries him out on to the lawn.

I take this opportunity to observe that I am sorry to say my train goes in an hour's time, and that I've sent for a fly.

"O!" says my Aunt, quite cheerfully, smiling (a week ago she would have cried), "we're going out for a drive with John in a quarter of an hour, so perhaps we shan't be here when you start."

This grates upon me: yes, although I don't want a scene (because it would be so trying for my nerves, and make me so feverish for travelling), yet this does grate on me.

I tell her I am going yachting with Wetherby. The word "yachting," besides having an aristocratic smack about it, must bring to the mind of any old lady who lives "at home at ease" (as the song says) the fact that she is accustomed to trouble herself very little about the dangers incurred by those who venture upon the seas, "when the stormy winds do blow." [It occurs to my mind, for one second, to wonder whether Wetherby goes to sea in such a state of things, or not. Not, I should say.]

My Aunt is impassive. She is not a good sailor herself, but hopes that I am. Have I ever been to sea before? No, I've not. Oh! End of that topic. Charlie brought in quite lively and frisky, but very damp. The means resorted to appear to have been very simple. John, by his own account "held the little beggar by the tail and dipped him in the sea." Result satisfactory, with a craving for more biscuits apparently. Doddridge embraces him, "O, de poo little Charlywarley, then! did they (meaning me—so kind of her, just as I'm going away) give it nasty almond-biscuits and cream, a little mannikin, then!" Doddridge is ordered off to dry him. I look at my watch—so does John.

"I say, Old Gal," this to my Aunt from John, "it's time for you to get on your go-to-meeting bonnet, as the one-horse shay will be round here before you've cleaned yourself," and he finishes off with a wink at me, as if I had suggested this style of address, and was quietly entering into the spirit of the thing.

My Aunt, who has sat herself down at her writing-table, only remarks, "How absurd you are, John," and then asks him "Who's coming herē to-morrow?"

"O," he replies, "there are the Tinton girls and Wayde."

"Will they come to the pic-nic on Thursday?" asks my Aunt. (My Aunt going to a pic-nic!!) John isn't quite certain, but he hopes so, and he adds, "I've got Judkin to bring his drag for Saturday, when we can all drive over in it to Canterbury; only he wants to know, if he comes back with us, can you bed him?"

My Aunt pauses for an instant, then quietly answers, "Of course we can, as George will be away then, and he can have his room."

Now, I should like—for this has roused me—I should like to dash my hat down, jump up, hit the table with my clenched fist, and exclaim, "No, confound it, I'm not going." But I don't, I merely smile, and reply upon the observation with assumed indifference, "Yes, I shall be away then," for I'm not going to flatter my Aunt and John, who is almost a bully in his manner, by showing any sort of desire to stay.

Why should they have put off all their amusements until my departure? True that I have said to my Aunt how much I love quiet, how I prefer Ramsgate, at her un-seasonable time, to Ramsgate in full bloom; but, hang it, I do like to be asked. There's something so melancholy, too, in hearing arrangements made in one's presence for gaieties to come off when (it's a sad phrase) one will be no longer here to witness them. It makes one feel as if the future were a blank. It seems to me (for having nothing to do with them while they are still continuing their conversation on the same subject, I can only sit and think) suddenly, a melancholy notion that Ramsgate will wake up to-morrow morning and I shan't be there. That my Aunt and John and their party will be gay, and not so much as a reference made to myself. Will any of them say, will either of these two here say, at the height of their revelry (fancy my Aunt's and Doddridge's revelry, bah !), "I wish George were here?" No, they won't, I feel they won't, and that's what touches me, and almost brings tears into my eyes.

At this instant the grenadier in petticoats announces "The carriage, mum !" and Doddridge appears with my Aunt's bonnet and shawl, which she puts on before the glass, while my Cousin John bustles into the hall, and I hear him ordering the grenadier to take heaps of rugs and wraps to the trap.

Another Note.—I thought a sailor was always a rough, hardy sort of chap, ready for all weathers, and rather preferring bad to good. But Cousin John From Sea (if he's a specimen, and not an exception) seldom goes out without a greatcoat, never walks a step farther than he can help, always carries an umbrella, never appears without the latest invented scent on his pocket handkerchief, and the best-fitting gloves ; and if there's the slightest sign of rain, or if it's blowing ever so little, catch him going out ! Not a bit of it. He has wraps on his bed, a wadded dressing-gown, a fire in his bed-room nearly all day, and seldom gets up till past ten, my Aunt allowing him to breakfast at whatever time he chooses. If our Navy is composed of Cousin Johns, then I don't believe in our Navy. He hasn't got a single sea-phrase—not a word about marling-spikes, bunting, gaffs, belay, and so forth. While I'm away out yachting, I shall be able to compare him, in my mind's eye, with real sailors, and shall write to my Aunt about him, and expose him as a naval impostor.

While I am thinking this out, my Aunt is getting herself ready. She is ready. Quite. So "Good-bye!" to me, from her. Nothing more. Not a purse of gold—the tip that I used to receive from her on my going to school multiplied now by as many times as I have increased in years. No—no memento. No hope expressed of ever seeing me again. I venture to throw this in, on my own account, in an off-hand manner, thus : "I'll try and run down during the season." My Aunt to this only replies, "You will no doubt find us here."

Cousin John puts her into the wagonette, and muffles her up with tiger skins, rough rugs, and a big cloak. To all intents and purposes, as far as I am concerned, he has buried my Aunt away out of my sight. That's what I've got to thank him for at present. An impostor sailor! He is going to drive! A sailor going to drive! My Aunt, who clutches at my arm spasmodically, and squeaks and screams, in a fly with me, sees him take the reins unmoved. "Good-bye, George, old boy," says he to me from the box; "keep yourself dry, and don't get very sick when you're out on the ocean wave." I do believe my Aunt, under her covers, is laughing at this brutality; and as to Doddridge—upon my word and honour, I'm not a vindictive man, but if I could just put Doddridge into a pantomime scene with the Clown and Pantaloon to make love to her after their peculiar fashion, ending with knocking her into a flour-tub, or waking her up with a hot poker, I should—I really should—like to see it done, and assist in doing it myself.

So they drive away.

I turn back to the hall. "Coo-coo-grrr; coo-coo-grrr!" says the Gentle Dove, bowing at me ten times to half a minute. I wish my fly would come. I feel moped, wretched, hipped. Why? Such small things oughtn't to affect a good constitution. No. Then is it the fact that I've got a bad constitution? Is it the From a dreamy state I am aroused. The fly!

Once more over the uneven roads, once more down Ramsgate's narrow streets (built for sociability's sake, probably, and with the smallest possible amount of pavement, suggesting tight-rope practice for beginners) towards the Station on the sands. Of course, a waggon, large enough to make ten of my fly (fly-horse included), meets us at the narrowest part; of course my flyman wanted to pass it, and failed; of course the waggon-driver is obstinate, and won't back; of course my driver won't be outdone by the waggon-driver; of course other carts are behind the waggon, and other flies and carts behind us, and all trade in this, one of the main streets, is suddenly paralysed. Of course all the drivers of all the carts and flies are excessively polite and civil to one another. Foot-passengers retire into shops on either side, and watch the proceedings, or, rather, as we don't proceed at all, the dead-lock.

I explain that I must be at the Station at such and such a time exactly; that it only wants two minutes; that it's most important I should catch the train; that I won't pay him if he doesn't; that Shouts from behind Waggoner gives way to the extent of about a quarter of an inch, by nearly emptying his load into a fishmonger's window. The quarter of an inch does it; released, we rush by him—Mazepa, in a fly tied to time, catching the train—imperfect simile, but thought of hurriedly, in connection with "Again he urges on his wild," &c. We round the market-place—the flyman defying the laws of centrifugal force by trying to keep himself straight on the box—down High Street, in sight of the sea,—On! On!—The train starts at three—my watch is just three—The bell! . . . “Now, sir!” . . . I feel it’s an affair of shillings. . . . Shilling to Porter. He flies away with trunk—myself after him, giving directions . . . Shilling to Guard, to get my ticket (which will delay him, too—Aha!) . . . Shilling to Railway Book-stall Man—I could give a shilling to anyone now who’d guarantee me in time for train.—Any papers? Quick! All papers! . . . Just one second—shilling to refreshment girl . . . What? Quick! Buns?—No. Sponge-cakes—sherry in a flask. . . . “Another sixpence, sir, please.” . . . No time to argue . . . “Take shilling.” . . . Away!—Carriage. Another shilling to Porter who opens door . . . Flyman is pursuing me. “Will I . . . Shall he . . .” We are off. Flyman trots along, with hand on carriage-door. No change. Flash of thought, sudden, decisive, and satisfactory for all parties:—

“The lady at the house will pay you. Drive back, and ask her. It’s all right.”

Ha! ha! The lady of the house is My Aunt. I shall be recalled to her memory.

In carriage. After excitement—Reaction.

THOUGHTS in the Train.—How very soon one gets through three newspapers! Having got through them, how curiously interesting the small paragraphs are, which one never notices on ordinary occasions. The same remark applies to the advertisements. I suppose it must be on some opportunity similar to the present (that is, that of being in a train alone on a longish journey), that a next of kin finds he's been advertised for, or somebody or other discovers that he will hear something to his advantage by calling on So-and-So. I wonder, as I look at these advertisements, whether my name will be there to-day. It would be, to say the least of it, such a subject for conversation afterwards, commencing, "I was looking at the front sheet of the Times, quite accidentally, for it's a thing I hardly ever do—perhaps not once in a year—when I suddenly hit upon my name," &c., &c.

Mem. for future perusals.—Never omit looking at this column; it only takes a minute, and it might turn out to be worth thousands. Perhaps an inquiry for next of kin, or an “If this catches the Eye,” may have been in, and I’ve missed it simply by not reading the front sheet of the Times. Perhaps some one is now enjoying a fortune that ought to have been mine; and if I found him out, and claimed it, the only answer would be, “Too late now: you were advertised for, for months, in the Times and other newspapers, and you didn’t turn up. It’s your own fault: better luck next time,” and so on.

After reading it carefully to-day.—There’s nothing in about me.

An Idea.—File the Times in future. Buy the back numbers for the last six months. I say six months, because I have some sort of notion that that’s the legal time given for heirs, or next of kin, to turn up. And yet how would a next of kin in Central Africa manage? How, also, would he be affected by an advertisement commencing, “Pursuant to an Order from the Court of Chancery,” and going on to say that if he didn’t do something or other within the next two weeks, he’d never hear of anything more to his advantage as long as he lived? A difficult question.

Still in Train.—Same train of thought. Sleepy. Very sleepy. Westgate-on-Sea. New Station. New place, too, apparently consisting of a block of houses recently built, and two sets of clothes-lines, on a sort of desolate common, with a fine view of the sea. Birchington. Good name for a place full of boys’ schools. Whitstable, where the people live on oysters, and, when there are no oysters, on other fish, until the oysters appear again. A gentleman who gets into the carriage here, tells me that it is a charming place to stay at, if you want to be perfectly quiet, and are fond of fish.

Mem.—Whitstable for quiet. When I am well enough to resume my Analytical History of Motion, will try Whitstable.

In answer to further inquiries, the gentleman says (that is, I understand him to say) that the largest oyster-bed owners are solicitors in London. I half smile, supposing him to be hiding some deep satire under this sentiment. He doesn't smile at all. I cease to smile, look surprised (as I am), and say, "Indeed!" After this, he takes a lot of papers out of a black bag, and begins to be, apparently, deeply interested in them.

Note in Travelling.—Use of little black bags with papers in them. It looks so business-like to take papers out. Peruse them always frowningly, then turn aside to look out of window, as if getting that last sentence quite clear before you go on again. Wish I had my MS., as far as I've gone, of Analytical History of Motion. It would puzzle him to know what I'd got. I am not inquisitive, and abominate impertinent curiosity, but I should like to know what he's reading up (or pretending to read up, for I don't believe in him a bit) in those papers. It might furnish matter for pleasant conversation while travelling. Perhaps he is one of the Oyster Solicitors getting up some case. Right of pearls found in bad oysters. The civilised world was at one time nearly being embroiled in a universal war on account of oysters.

Am very sleepy. Sure it's unhealthy to be so sleepy. A sleepy pear, for example, is an unhealthy pear. It's strange, now I think of it, that all my symptoms lately have shown themselves in some connection with my nose. It is strange, as showing what force there is in presentiments, or presentimental aversions. Remember stories (facts) of people who dreaded fire, and took every precaution against accidents by fire ; result (by fatality) a Fire, and disastrous consequences. Remember similar example about old lady who hated crossing a thoroughfare—always avoided it. One day she was carefully avoiding it, and was run over. Remember a friend telling me that he had a horror of falling over a cliff: he said that he felt that if he did fall over a cliff, it would be (so to speak, and to put it in his words, as lightly as possible) “rather more than he’d bargained for.” He meant that he’d be killed. He is alive now ; but still there is the aversion for cliffs, and he wouldn’t come down to Ramsgate, for example, on any account. It’s all what Samuel would call “Naytchar.” It is the “Naytchar” of some men to have presentiments and aversions. I have both. I hate the idea of a red nose in the future. Yet everything seems to tend towards my nose. This drowsiness shows itself there. (Note.—I really think I must mention this to my medical man, personally or by letter.) I get sleepy, as it were, in my nose, somewhere about the bridge. I drop off to sleep without any sort of notice, without knowing it ; in fact, it seems to me as if I was thinking deeply, pursuing one subject through a confused crowd of ideas, like looking for some important slip of paper (which is indelibly fixed on the retina of your mind’s eye) in a bureau full of documents, old MSS., forgotten receipts, bits of red tape, and odds and ends. And then . . . you take up something which has nothing to do with the object you’re in search of. . . . It interests you . . . and then . . . something else you’ve lost sight of for ages . . . then . . . everything. . . .

“Tickets! Tickets, please!” I wake up. Oyster Solicitor, bag, and papers vanished, perhaps long ago. To sleep so heavily, and so early in the day, must be bad. I make this note (for my doctor’s benefit, and my own) after arousing myself.

Being aroused, I feel sticky all over, as if some one had been gumming me together.

Note.—Another curious effect. I go to sleep in a train, clean, neat, and tidy. I awake exactly the reverse—i. e., dirty, slovenly, and untidy—and as if I'd turned a dull yellow colour during sleep. My clothes, too, have a sort of second-hand, ready-made look, and appear to have gone back in their cut to a distant period, when the fashion wasn't the same as now. I come out of the train at the London terminus like a Rip Van Winkle of three hours' drowsiness. I was quite fresh when I got in at Ramsgate, I am quite stale at Victoria.

Sudden Thought.—How fish must suffer in transmission! Yes, that's my sensation after a sleepy journey—flabbiness. Thank goodness, I am looking forward to a real good blow on the sea in Wetherby's yacht. Shall be aboard to-night or to-morrow morning early, and shall soon be looking as healthy as possible; that is, as sunburnt as possible.

Question. Is to be sunburnt to be healthy? (Mem. Consult a physician.) People say of a sunburnt person, "he looks the picture of health." Logically, the picture of a thing is not the thing itself. The boy who is the very picture of his mother is, clearly, not his mother. Ergo, a person who appears to be the picture of health is not health itself, but, at best, very like health.

I do believe I am going to sleep, standing up, on the platform of the station. This is serious. A porter rouses me about my luggage and a cab. Where shall he tell the man to drive to? I have actually seated myself in the cab, still dreamily, without saying a word on the subject. These mental phenomena must be noted down. Also that my nose appears to have become rather thicker than usual about the bridge. Every man ought to be brought up to learn something of medicine and anatomy. It should be part of his education. Instead of being nervous now about this nasal development, I should be perfectly happy (perhaps), if I only knew what connection the bridge of my nose had with other portions of the human frame.

Mem. To get up anatomy, with special attention to my own. Send for a book; capital opportunity for studying it on board Wetherby's yacht.

Driving through Town to the Other Station. Feeling of loneliness. See nobody I know. My best friends, if in London, are utterly ignorant of my passing through. Wish I was out of it again. Melancholy. Perhaps melancholy is a part of sleepiness. Am struck by the heartlessness of London. The phrase "the heart of London" is an impossibility. Wonder what my Aunt & Co. are doing now?

At Next Terminus. Find that I shan't be at Wetherby's until late at night. His invitation was, "Come down any time this week, ask for my yacht, and they (who?) will put you on board." I have three-quarters of an hour before starting. Better dine.

CHAPTER XVII.

DINNER AT A STATION—ITS DISCOMFORT—THOUGHTS ON EATABLES — ENGLISH — CONTINENTAL — INFERIORITY — SUPERIORITY — HINTS—MESSRS. STEEPLES AND LAKE ADVISED — A BOOKSTALL — OFFERS — OFF AGAIN — TRAVELLING MAXIMS—THROUGH DEVONSHIRE—FORWARD.

ONCERNING Dinner at Railway Station. As a rule, a most uncomfortable thing. First, one knows the dinner is only a makeshift.

Secondly—it's not the hour you're accustomed to dine, which is enough to upset you at once.

Thirdly—there's a certain amount of excitement about it, because you are, as it were, dining against time, and excitement is bad for digestion.

Fourthly. The consciousness that you won't be able to lounge after dinner, but must see after your ticket and luggage, is very prejudicial to health.

I determine upon dining. I will "commit the enormity" of having a little dinner. Wonder how Budd is. Perhaps committing the enormity of having a Turkish Bath. To avoid objections number three and four, I find an Official, who says, "O yes, he'll be about the place," and give him half-a-crown for himself on condition that he gets my ticket for me. So much trouble off my hands.

I find a Porter, who appears to me (and who says he is) to be stationary by the Luggage Label Department. I give him a shilling to guard my "things." A Porter standing by him, but not stationary, I also invest in, to the same amount. His duties (towards me) are to secure me a seat in a carriage, and take thither my great-coat and portable things, including my umbrella.

It suddenly occurs to me that it's rather out of character to take an umbrella on board a yacht. Still, can't leave it behind in charge of Porter, to be left from now till called for.

Go to dinner in Refreshment Room. Brilliant Barmaid standing out against a background of brilliant and variegated bottles, like what a fancy chemist's shop might be.

Valuable Note "to the Faculty." Why not a Fancy Chemist as well as a Fancy Baker? It might be quite an attractive place, with a sort of bar, where medicines could be on tap. Powders and pills might be done up in a fanciful manner, say as crackers and bonbons, with mottoes. Healthy Mottoes, not the nonsense one sees at Christmas time.

Ideas, for instance, for simple and healthy mottoes at Fancy Chemists :—

In a cracker.

He who feels that he is ill,
Will do well to take this pill.

In a Nut scooped out, with Powder and Motto inside.

You've a headache got, my love,
Which this powder will remove.

In a Bonbon, in one end of which is a miniature bottle.—To an over-danced Young Lady who can't sleep.

If your orbs you bright would keep,
Take these chloral drops and sleep.

And so on. Haven't time for further consideration of the subject, as I've only got three-quarters of an hour for dinner.

Railway station vegetables. Steamed. Greens of bright colour, lukewarm. Potatoes hard at the edges, as if discoloured parts had been cut off, or large potatoes had been pared down to resemble the delicacy of little new potatoes. Ingenious, if so, but failure. Everything served up with as much electroplate as possible, probably (in the proprietor's idea) to give the visitor a reminiscence of the comforts of his own aristocratic home. The vegetables are kept warm (not hot) in a sort of banker's safe. I protest. Waiter replies, that, they can't be any warmer, and seems hurt at my expression of dissatisfaction, as much as to say, "Well, these vegetables have been served up lots of times to-day, and no one's grumbled. If you'd come earlier, you'd have had 'em hot."

I feel that if he did say so, there'd be truth in his remark, but not reason. There are forced flies on the table. It's only May, and cold, too. Waiter says, "Yes, sir, they're here pretty well all the year round." They're accustomed to him, and he to them. The flies probably don't touch him. He can go into this den of flies uninjured, like Van Amburgh among the lions.

The mutton is chilly. The gravy is of a higher temperature than the mutton. It seems as if my slice had caught cold and was taking a warm bath in the gravy. But this heat is deceptive, as while I am meditating upon it, it becomes suddenly cold. It's a sort of gravy that is evidently injured by exposure to the air. A mountain of cheese with a broken ridge is brought me, and some rocky geological bread. "Pulled" they call it. Who pulls it? I say to the waiter (by way of aiding digestion by any kind of conversation), "The proprietor, I suppose, gets the pull of it," alluding to the bread.

Waiter smiles, and moves a spoon from my table to next table.

Familiarity with waiter must result in sixpence. Reserve with a waiter may be set down at threepence—the extra money being three-penn'orth of conversation.

Time to finish. The only approach to comfort in railway station dining rooms is in those of Messrs. Steeples and Lake (which is not their name, but very like it), who do manage very well, and might manage much better if they'd only take the trouble to adopt the Continental system of buffet-ing and Restauration. The feeding provided for us poor English is so gross here, while that provided for us by our lively neighbours, or our serious neighbours, is light, wholesome, good, cheap, and just exactly enough. May Messrs. Steeples and Lake take the hint. They can do the thing well if they will.

Big man enters, and commences a similar dinner to mine, only he's got to do it in ten minutes, and evidently is accustomed to gorging at a great pace, and getting all he can for his money in a short time.

Note.—Head hot—my head, I mean. Sleepy. Drowsy. I feel that I have committed the enormity of dinner. Hardly ten minutes more. Where's Official who was to save me trouble by getting my ticket? Don't see him. When I employed him he was the only official visible in the Station, which was otherwise quite empty. Now the train is here, about to start, and there are crowds of people, passengers and officials. Where's my stationary Porter? He is here: good. Sixpence. My un-stationary Porter? He's taken my things to a carriage. Which carriage? Can't find him. Hurry, bustle, and anxiety directly after this dinner at an unseasonable hour. O, My Health! I wish I hadn't taken beer, too, with the cheese. It seems to be weighing on my brain. I wish I knew the Official's number whom I charged with getting my ticket. And where's the Porter? What's his number?

The five minutes' bell!

The Porter—my Porter—has kept me a place. All to myself. Extra shilling to Official to keep it. He knows the Guard, or whatever he was, who was charged with getting my ticket.

Three minutes more. Plenty of time to pick up useful information. Ergo, go to the bookstall.

Mem. for the future.—To save time, always want one book at least, then you'll know what to ask for at a railway stall when you've only got three minutes to spare. Also, always arrange beforehand exactly what refreshments you'll take when you stop for ten minutes en route.

I find myself staring at a sort of kaleidoscope of book-covers. Boy offers me Love's Trials, in yellow and red, for two shillings; then, on my abrupt refusal, he recommends (as having read it) Dark Deeds of Detectives, with a picture outside of a saffron-faced man, in a green coat, with blue tie and a red waistcoat, firing a tremendous pistol at a girl in a dress of faded blue, some of which colour has got into her hair. I hesitate. I should like to ask the boy to open the book precisely at the page where this thrilling incident occurs (which evidently must be the point of the story), just to let me read that one passage, see how I like it, and then decide upon purchase or not. Probably not; but it's not worth giving two shillings on the chance of its turning out good, and, after all, perhaps, getting so tired of it, after the first ten pages, that I shall never reach the situation described in the picture. Besides, to all intents and purposes, I now know what is the leading feature of this particular book. For instance, if any one asks me hereafter "Have you read Dark Deeds, &c.?" I can answer, "Ah, you mean with that story in it about the fellow shooting at the girl," and then I can add that I don't remember much about it. At all events this will be sufficient to lead to conversation. I believe "well-read men" who talk, get up their reputation in this way. If not, good notion.

Time to start. Result of inspection of bookstall is that I buy no books. Altercation between my tipped Guard and a stout Superintendent, who has put three old ladies and two children into my carriage. They are going to Bath. Let them. There's only half a minute. Heavens! my ticket! . . . Official suddenly appears with it. My tipped Guard has got one seat for me in smoking carriage full. Rush from one carriage to the other, with bags, rugs, and coat. People in smoking carriage evidently look upon my coming at the last moment as an intrusion.

The best thing to do (note) under these circumstances is to be excessively polite. Thus, Somebody's bag and coat incommode me. Politely find out owner. "Is this yours?" very sweetly, and always smiling more or less. It is owned. "Permit me to"—then, when he sees you going to stuff it away somewhere, or put it up above insecurely over his head, he will take it and bestow it away himself, to the comfort of all parties concerned.

Maxim for travelling.—A soft manner deprecates wrath, and a smile in time saves frowns.

Mem. (in train). Might make a series of maxims for travellers on the above model very useful. Dedicate them to The Travellers. Call the volume Passengers' Proverbs.

Travelling Maxim No. 2.—The Early Passenger catches the train.

Maxim 3rd.—An Unprotected First-class Female is a Crown to her Guard (or half-a-crown at least.)

Maxim 4th (for Guards and Railway Officials generally).—Look after the First Class, and the rest can take care of themselves.

Maxim 5th.—One Sandwich does not make a luncheon.

Maxim 6th (for Train Guides, new monthly).—Tempora mutantur, the Times are changed.

Maxim 7th.—The Luggage that is unlabelled is lost.

Maxim 8th.—The Universal Railway Key that locks all carriages is a silver one.

SITTING in the Carriage.—Quite full. We are all settling down, and making ourselves gradually less disagreeable to one another. Every one has brought into the carriage a bag, a great coat, a rug, and an umbrella, each person apparently under the impression that the same original idea would occur to no other passenger except himself. A gentleman in the next seat presently asks me, "How Bath races went off this year?"

He has not led up to this inquiry, and I feel somewhat taken aback. I reply that "I do not know, as I have not been there this year," which, without committing me to anything, leads him to suppose that my absence from this Spring Meeting (if it is a Spring Meeting) is a solitary exception to my general practice.

He has evidently made up his mind that I am a sporting character, and have got information on various "events," which I am sliily keeping to myself, as his next question, with an apology for his own ignorance, as he has not been long in England, is, "whether I don't think that Scavenger's safe for the Two Thousand?"

Note. Sporting amusements are part of our national character. Every Englishman is born a Sailor and a Sportsman. Of course, if he doesn't keep it up after being born with these advantages, that's his fault. Odd that it should never have struck me till now!

Mem. One really ought to read sporting papers once a week: it wouldn't take more than a quarter of an hour to get up the names of a few leading horses. Some men are equally ready on all subjects: these are men who do not waste their club subscriptions.

Mem. Next to being rich, the best thing is to have the credit for being so. Ergo, the next best thing to knowing all about every thing is to look as if you knew it. To say, at once, "Sir, I do not know," or, "Sir, I am utterly and totally ignorant of the subject you have started," would (Johnsonianly) put an end to all such casual conversation as might beguile a journey.

I reply, with some hesitation, that "I do not feel quite certain as to what Scavenger may do;" which is strictly true, as I've never even heard the animal's name before. I believe my answer will cost this gentleman some anxious consideration, and perhaps bring about an entire change in the betting.

He apologises again for having been absent in India for some time, and I smile, as much as to say, "O, don't mention it!" and then he asks me who are considered the best "boys to put up" now? A searching question. Luckily, I've heard the phrase "boy to put up" before, or might have thought he alluded (having been absent in India for some time) to the obsolete climbing boys. I've an idea that the other passengers are furtively listening. I feel that, as an Englishman, I ought to know the names of the jockeys, and particularly as I have not the excuse to offer of having been out of England for a long time. I cautiously reply, "Well——" and consider. A name suddenly occurs to me, as if by inspiration. I come out with it, —I say, that "I suppose Grimstone's not a bad one."

I have scarcely uttered this opinion before I feel I've made a false step. Firstly, it occurs to me that Grimstone is not a jockey, but a prizefighter; secondly, that I don't think he's a prizefighter, but a cricketer; thirdly, that, if so, he's an amateur cricketer; and, fourthly that he's an eminent Chancery barrister. I wait an instant, expecting my neighbour, or some one in the carriage, to say, "Grimstone! Who's Grimstone? What did he ride? When did he ride?" &c., &c. In which case I should give up Grimstone, and suppose that I was thinking of somebody else.

My sporting inquirer appears impressed by my reply, and merely observes, "Ah!" then, after looking at nothing in particular out of the left window, and after turning his attention to something of equal importance out of the right window, he evidently determines upon not "asking this witness (myself) any further questions," and gradually subsides into a newspaper.

Dyspeptic Symptoms consequent upon the early dinner enormity.—Indigestion from now to Exeter. Drowsiness. After Exeter, darkness. Near the Sea. Rain. Passengers have dropped out one by one. Sense of loneliness.

Thoughts in the Dark.—Note in pocket-book, with the idea of "writing to the Times" on the subject.

(a). Why are there no lights in the carriages between Exeter and Torquay?

(b). To find out if there isn't an Act of Parliament compelling Railway Companies to put lights in carriages. Mem. Does this Act only apply to ships? If so, suggest to some one (find an M.P., and suggest it to him) to bring in a Bill for the purpose.

By the Way. First find your M.P., and then might suggest plenty of Bills and Measures. With a view to My Health, I wonder how a Parliamentary Life would suit me? Think it over. If my Doctor says it's just the thing, I might go in for somewhere. Where? As what? How much? If much, would My Aunt advance the money? She might for the honour of the family. Might give her an I. O. U., payable on my becoming a Cabinet Minister. One never knows what may eventuate. These are Thoughts in the Dark. Good title for a Religious Tract. Might suggest it to Rev. J. C. Ryle. Hear he makes thousands by a Tract of only four pages. Nothing easier than to write a Tract, or any number of Tracts. Feel I could do it. Why not? If I was a Clergyman, I might. Why not write as a Clergyman, say, "Thoughts in the Dark, by the Rev. J. A. B. H. L. K." Might add (to puzzle the Public) "& Co." New Tract (Fifty Thousandth, this Day), by Rev. J. A. B. H. L. K. & Co. Or really start a Tract Company (Limited).

This money (out of the tracts) would defray election expenses. Some one told me once that he was travelling in a train (as I am now), and happened to say to a casual acquaintance (but I am all alone now in the dark) that he intended going in for Parliament. Whereupon the Casual Acquaintance said, "Are you, by Jingo!" or words to that effect; adding, "Then you're the man for me. Will you come back to (I forget where), and stand for the County (or Borough, I don't remember which)? " My friend said, " Yes, certainly," but expressing at the same time a wish to go home and get another pair of trousers (I think it was), as he had not intended being away more than a day when he started. The Casual Acquaintance wouldn't let him do it, but jumped out at the next station, took my friend with him, telegraphed back to somewhere, where he'd come from, to say, " Found a man to stand for the place : will be amongst you (i.e., the Electors) in an hour." And a telegram to agent, " Issue Address at once." By the time that they reached the town the Addresses were out, and my friend told me that he was received by Deputations at the station, cheered all over the place, carried in triumph to his hotel, presided at a public dinner, addressed crowds from the balcony, wore colours, presented colours, was serenaded at night, went to church next day with a band playing, and listened to an election sermon, with an appropriate election hymn afterwards ; that, being short of stature, he had consented to stand upon three hassocks in his pew, in order to show himself to the people ; that, in order to secure the votes of the Churchmen, he went to service three times that day in three different places, never closed his eyes once through any of the sermons, and stood on four hassocks in the evening because of the gaslight being bad, and never once took his eyes off his book ; that henceforth, not only was he the Popular Candidate (as his Casual Acquaintance informed him), but the only Candidate, until the very last day but one, when a meeting was held in which he was denounced as an adventurer by all parties, and some one whose name had never been mentioned, suddenly issued an address ; and that, upon this, his Casual Acquaintance took him aside, and advised him that the best course he could pursue would be to retire at once, before the Mob became very violent, in which case he (my friend) might be held legally responsible for the damage done to the Hotel, and perhaps for the destruction of half of the public buildings in the town ; that, hearing this, my friend went off by the very next train, disguised as a bricklayer, but was recognised by the roughs, hooted at, and pelted before he got to the station, into which he was dragged by the police. That, before he was allowed to go, he was obliged to pay his hotel bill of about five hundred pounds, besides drawing cheques for printing, treating, and a tailor's and haberdasher's bill for several entire new suits (shirts and ties in election colours, and trousers with election stripes down the sides) made in a hurry, in consequence of having come off without his portmanteau, and which were of no sort of use to him afterwards ; and that, finally, he read of the new Candidate's unopposed return, but never again fell in with his Casual Acquaintance, nor heard a word about him, except from one man, who told him, confidentially, that the less he saw of him the better. That his family (my friend's family) had him (my friend) watched by a detective, and once his relations clubbed together to pay a mad doctor to visit him. All this occurs to me in the dark, between Exeter and Torquay, and (to trace the stream of ideas back to their source,) it all arose out of the Company having supplied no light to the first-class carriage. Cheer myself up. Directly I arrive at Torquay, will go on board. Perhaps Wetherby's steward or pilot or captain will meet me. If the Station is (as one is at Ramsgate) on the sands, I shall be able to take a boat instead of a fly, and be on deck in a few minutes. It will be a change. I feel that early, unseasonable, and hurried dining would, if persisted in, end in unnatural stoutness.

Torquay.—Here I am. The only first-class passenger. No one is waiting to receive me. I feel so lonely that I should like to go back again in the same train.

Note.—Sudden and causeless depression is an unhealthy sign. Rouse myself.

AUTIOUSLY, I ask the Station-Master, in return for giving him my ticket, if he knows Mr. Wetherby. Briefly, he doesn't. I mention Mr. Wetherby's yacht. No, he doesn't know Mr. Wetherby, or his yacht, but dares say Flyman may be able to inform me. Then he shouts out, "Bill!" to some one in the distance, to which some one in the distance answers, whereupon Station Master walks to the end of the platform, and I walk out of the Station.

Flyman, waiting for the chance of a fare, knows, or thinks he knows, Mr. Wetherby.

As he may only say this from an interested motive, I question him as to his feeling of confidence in his own assertion.

"O, yes, sir," he answers ; "Mr. Wetherby, as lives at Firkin Terrace."

"No," I say, impressively, "he has a yacht. He is only in harbour—I mean in port—here."

I am uncertain whether I should say "harbour" or "port," but as he's only a flyman (perhaps the most un-nautical calling in existence), correctness in terms won't be of any consequence. I've not come to see a man living like anybody else could do, in a terrace, but a yachtsman, sleeping on board, merely "putting in" to take provisions—to "ship cargo" is nearer the expression, I fancy, but will ask Wetherby—and then "putting out" or "putting off" again in the morning with a fair wind and the stud-sails set.

Mem. Coming upon yachting suddenly, I seem to know much more about it than I had imagined. Can't think where I got the term "stud-sails" from. It flashed on me suddenly, and I note it down, while I think of it, in the fly, on my way to Firkin Terrace to begin with, where it certainly appears, from the Flyman's description of him, that Wetherby has at some time or other resided.

Anticipations. To have met at the Station a pilot-looking man with a gold band round his cap. That he would salute me, and to my question as to whether he was from Wetherby's yacht, he would have replied, "Aye, aye, your honour!" That then we should have heaved ahead in a fly, with this seaman steering, on the box, directing, as it were, the wheels of the vehicle. That we should have been driven to some gateway leading to a port, or the docks, or the harbour. That, then, a sailor would have met us to carry luggage. That then we should have got into a small boat—"jolly boat," I think—if dark, one sailor in the bows with a torch,—that lights should have been hoisted from the Elfin Queen (or whatever Wetherby's yacht's name is), and that he himself should have been standing at the gangway—the gangway being where one goes on board—to welcome me. In fact, novelty : novelty in surroundings in atmosphere, in everything, in fact, being the very best thing for my Health.

Realisation.—Number 14, Firkin Terrace. Seaside-looking house, apparently. Flyman rings bell. Man-servant answers it. Mr. Wetherby's? Yes, sir. At home? No, sir. On board? O, no, sir. (This decisively, as if such a proceeding was quite out of the question.) He expects me? Yes, sir, he said a gentleman was coming. (This undecidedly, rather guardedly.) Pause. What next? Flyman looks at me, as much as to say, "Well, now then, after all your fuss I'm right, and here's Wetherby's; what are you going to do next?" I decide promptly. I say authoritatively, "Take down my luggage." I descend. Flyman paid. Luggage in the passage. Alone with servant. One question, with a tinge of uncertainty, and a feeling that I am exactly 350 miles away from my own bed, "I suppose you've got a room for me here, eh?" "Well, sir," the servant, a most respectful and evidently obliging man, in undress, replies, "My lady didn't know whether you'd prefer sleeping at the hotel, or not."

[Rapid thoughts during the pause between his question and my answer. My Lady! who's she? I don't ask, as I evidently ought to know. Always thought Wetherby was a bachelor. But if he isn't, how can his wife be "My Lady," unless he's Lord Wetherby, or Sir Something Wetherby? and I've only heard him spoken to and spoken of by his friends as "Wetherby." Very awkward this. It now strikes me, for the first time, that Wetherby is, after all, only an acquaintance; but whenever I've met him he's been one of those hearty men whom one seems, from their manner, to have known for years. Strictly speaking, I have only met him three times, but then on the very first occasion he invited me to come out yachting with him. I fancy, though, that that was in December. However, whenever it was, or whatever he is, it's done now. Last Thought. If I go to Hotel will Lord, or Sir Something, Wetherby, pay my bill there. If not, and supposing, after all, he doesn't yacht, the whole thing's an imposition. I decide.]

My reply. "O, no ; I prefer stopping here, certainly." Very well, then, he'll take my things up. My Lady, he adds, is in the drawing-room. A bell rings. That, says the servant, is for the chamber candle. He'll show me up. What name shall he say ?

I tell him. We commence mounting the stairs. I wish he'd inform me who My Lady is. I should like to see Wetherby first ; but if his wife—or whatever relation My Lady may be—is at home, it won't look well for me to avoid her, and sneak up to bed. Wish I could go back again, even 350 miles, or wish I'd said I'd choose the Hotel. Too late now. The drawing-room door.

The butler, or servant of some sort, not in livery, but, on second thoughts, not old enough for a butler . . .

[Note.—Why isn't there a Servants' College, with "Butler" for a degree? B.A., Aged Butler. M.D., Major Domo. The Undergraduates in buttons: additional buttons being, somewhat after the manner of Mandarins, a sign of superior rank or reward of merit. Culminating point of buttons in a Bachelor. Bachelor's Buttons. Bachelor to be Footman in livery. There's evidently a sort of idea in this, which I jot down on retiring for the night at Wetherby's. Might obtain a Government subsidy to provide lecturers. Think it out, and suggest it to somebody interested in the Educational movement. The idea to include female education for cooks, housemaids, ladies'-maids, scullery-maids, dairy-maids, &c., &c., and nurses and nursemaids, Lectures to the latter given, practically, with dummy babies in perambulators, cradles, and so forth. Think it out.]

The domestic . . . when in doubt speak of a servant as a "domestic" . . . opens the drawing-room door, first-floor. He, on his side of the door, takes it for granted, evidently, that I am intimate with Lady Wetherby (that is, if it is Lady Wetherby), and Lady Wetherby, on her side of the door, as evidently takes it for granted that I am the chamber-candlestick for which she has rung. The domestic announces my name wrongly, and I am there to explain at once who I am, and also who I am not, which is awkward to begin with.

There are two ladies; one dark, undeniably handsome, and, so to speak, massively dressed; the other, very tall, golden-haired, and, also so to speak, atmospherically dressed. The first all velvet, real lace, and splendid jewellery: the second, all gauzes, suggestive of either being wafted away in a cloud, or requiring an attendant to be always on the watch with a hearth-rug, in case of her getting too near a fire. The former the substance, the latter, taking into account height and general flimsiness, the shadow. Substance is so clearly Lady Wetherby, that I have no doubt on the subject. As clearly, too, it flashes upon me that Wetherby is only Mr. Wetherby, but has married a Lady Somebody in her own right.

Another Flash. It occurs to me suddenly and momentarily, that the picture at present is something like what I've seen on the first page of a story in the London Journal, with description underneath to this effect: "Lady Wetherby and her companion receive the Mysterious Stranger."

"Lady Wetherby," I say, with a feeling that it will be all right presently, and that in a few minutes we shall be sitting down and chatting together as if we'd known one another for years; "I must apologise for disturbing you at this late hour." So far 'the Court is with me,' and I continue; "but the fact is," [if I'd thought twice I shouldn't have used this phrase, it seems always to mean so exactly the opposite, and to create antagonism and doubt, but not being able to revise the sentence, I go on]—"that when I last met your husband"—she seems interested in my "fact"—great point to interest your audience at the outset—"about three weeks or so ago"—the ladies look at one another with a sort of glance which seems to ask each other, "Shall we scream or ring?"—being accustomed to nervous people, (my Aunt, for example, would have shrieked, or been in tears before this—I suppose that they have both been reading closely, or been fast asleep, and my unexpected appearance has discomposed them,) I continue quietly—"he told me to come down, and he'd be sure to be here, and so"—

Heavens! What's the matter?

Lady Wetherby literally staggers back against the mantel-piece—she hasn't far to stagger having been standing on the hearth-rug—and the Muslin Shadow dashes at her, convulsively.

Brilliant Flash (to evince presence of mind), I say "Perhaps it's the heat," and I run to open the middle window, with the air of a medical man whose superior knowledge, on being called in at a crisis, suggests an immediate and certain remedy.

"No! No!" cries the Muslin Shadow, "it's some mistake. Please open the door, and call Clasper." This is addressed to me. Attempt opening the door from within at the same instant as the domestic with chamber candles opens it from without. Anything more painful than——

Another Flash. To show my chivalry, by ignoring the agony from the bridge of my nose across my forehead upwards to the roots of my hair, and addressing the man as Clasper.

"Clasper," I say, anxiously, "Lady Wetherby wants ——"

In a second he puts down the candlesticks, and goes to the head of the staircase. He calls out "Clasper!" Unless they are all mad, and I've come to the wrong house (which can't be), he, at all events, is not Clasper.

A voice (soprano) from above replies, "Yes," and a light foot-step brings Clasper, the Lady's-maid, a very pretty, elegant girl — (sort of person my Aunt ought to have instead of Doddridge) — into the room.

The street-door bangs.

A voice — Wetherby's — Heaven be thanked! — shouts out, "Here, Robert!" — then bustle, bustle below — "Tell Bill to —" bustle, bustle below, and sound of steps on stairs. I don't think I ever was more glad to see any one than I am now to welcome Wetherby.

WETHERBY is in his full yachting costume, which is the first sign of the fulfilment of what I've come down here for that I've as yet seen. Up to this moment there's not been a nautical symptom about the place.

Wetherby is about one-eighth (taking him to scale roughly) bigger than myself every way, and immensely hearty.

"Hallo!" he shouts, bursting upon the scene, "Here you are! Capital. Only got a bedroom top of the house to give you, because Miss"—here it occurs to him that we are not alone and he turns brusquely—"let me introduce you to Miss Straithmere, Miss Janie Straithmere,"—Here it strikes him that something is the matter somewhere, but Lady Wetherby is now again erect, and Clasper is holding her candle for her. My friend is puzzled. "Eh?" he says, "Not well, Betty?" This to Lady Wetherby, who smiles and observes that it was nothing of any consequence, and fears (to me) that I must have been very, &c. &c., to which I reply that I beg she won't, &c. &c., and Wetherby then introduces me to his Sister-in-Law, Lady Wetherby, wherewith she gives me her hand gracefully, begs me to excuse her, as she is rather, &c. &c., whereupon I murmur something about being myself also rather, mumble mumble to the end of some sentence (not complete in my mind) which she doesn't stop for, but ascends the stairs followed by Clasper and candle, and then (at a summons from my Lady) by Miss Janie, who bows to me with her head well forward, as if going full butt at the door, and shooting at me such a telling glance from under her eyelashes as I feel is equal to an hour's conversation with her tête-à-tête.

"Good night, Miss Straithmere," I say with polished courtesy, inclining my head slowly at an acute angle to the top of my spine, disguising the sudden impulse brought about by her name being Janie, her golden hair, and that Parthian shot from under her eyelids, which would lead me, but for the usages of Society, to put my arm round her, and say "Janie be mine!"

[Note at Night, on consideration. Is this love at first sight, or is it merely the effect of the sudden contrast between what is, at Wetherby's, and what was; viz., My Aunt, Doddridge & Co., united ages amounting to a hundred and twenty, including Charley, the lap-dog and the Dove? Perhaps so. Sleep on it.]

"Janie," says Wetherby to me (and somehow I don't like his calling her Janie; in fact, I feel inclined to take him to task for it as a liberty, only that it occurs to me that I am not yet in a position to do so,—still, if there is one thing that I at this moment object to in Wetherby, it is the familiar terms he is evidently on with Miss Straithmere)—“Janie,” Wetherby tells me, “has explained the mistake you made. Betty—Lady Wetherby—and her two boys, always live with me now, as I’m the children’s guardian, and she keeps house, and so forth.”

I express my regret at the contretemps, occasioned, I put it modestly, by my stupidity, whatever it was, but Wetherby takes the greater part of the blame to himself, as he says he ought to have told me, and the smaller part of it he puts on the shoulders of the ladies, who, he says, had been reading some horrible stories of ghosts and spirits just before my arrival; and so when I came in with my announcement it startled Lady Wetherby considerably.

It appears that Lady Wetherby is the widow of Sir James Wetherby, my friend’s stepbrother, who was knighted in India for doing something, or not doing something, with the Government stores and the Rajah of somewhere.

Mem. for the Future. When in doubt as to relationships merely, if absolutely necessary to speak at all, mention surnames. For instance if I had spoken to Lady Wetherby only of her brother-in-law as Wetherby no harm would have been done, but to tell her that I had lately seen her husband and had come down by his invitation. . . . It was very careless. I am glad, on thinking over it, that at all events I said that I had come down at the late Sir Something Wetherby’s request. Take care in futuro.

Up to this moment Wetherby hasn’t said a word about yachting. Odd. He suddenly takes up a candlestick, shouts “Robert!” then adds, “he’ll show you your room. Good night,” and disappears.

At Night. The nearest approach to yachting, at present, is my room at the top of the house, which is uncommonly like a cabin in point of size and inconvenience ; but fitted up with a bedstead much too large and high for the place. Into this I climb and then creep. If called suddenly, and startled into a sitting position, I shall knock my head against the ceiling. Must impress this well on my memory before dropping off to sleep. Wonder if I shall hear anything of the yacht to-morrow. Wetherby can't have given it up. . . . Miss Janie Straithmere . . . Good eyes knock my head ceiling pretty name—Janie . . . elections . . . Sir James Wetherby . . . candlesticks . . . think I'm . . . then if . . . Sleep.

Awoke early by the sun, which streams in through the attic window, evidently mistaking it for a cucumber frame, and me perhaps for the vegetable itself, curled up on its bed. There is no blind. I foresee biliousness and headache for the day if the sun goes on like this. Time 6.30.

Three flies, suddenly warmed into life, commence a spasmodic buzzing. One of them makes pertinacious darts, buzzing viciously (what is more irritating than a fly's buzz?) at my forehead and my ear.

Flash of Thought. Fly caught in my hair, sure of it . . . slap . . . no . . . he is gone. I don't want to get up till called.

Flash of Genius. Put my head under the sheet. Do so, and puzzle the flies. Snooze.

7.30. Entrance of Robert. Robert the domestic, with clothes. Robert's costume strikes me. Boating or yachting costume, with cricketing shoes. This looks like the sea ! the sea ! "Mr. Wetherby," he says, "breakfasts at eight exactly."

I ask, with some little doubt as to even the existence of the yacht, "If we are going out yachting to-day?"

"Yes, sir," answers Robert ; "I've just been on board to tell the Captain to be ready for eleven."

Ha! Good. Now, then, for a cruise. Just what I want. Whether it's the sun this morning, or the journey yesterday, and the Railway-station dinner in the middle of the day, I don't know, but I feel drowsy, heavy, and I've got a sort of tightness about the bridge of the nose which I had before the Turkish Baths. Also (which is what I've been struggling with for months) I feel fat. I feel it: I don't know whether it is outwardly observable, but there is more in me, so to speak, than meets the eye, and I have a sense of fatness about me which is depressing. I experience (and note it in My Health's diary) torpor while dressing. "To spring from the couch and don his suit of mail," instead of being with me, as with the Knights of old, the work of a few minutes, occupies more than half an hour. Also I remark in myself signs of indecision as to costume, which are consequent upon this feeling of languor, tightness of nose (above bridge), and general fatness. It seems to me that for yachting one ought to observe an easy and négligé costume. My idea of this, after much thought, during which I nearly fall asleep again on a chair is No Waistcoat. But Miss Janie and Lady Wetherby Query. Won't The No Waistcoat Costume be disrespectful?

Decision. Dress as in ordinary life for breakfast, see how other people are got up, then, if necessary, return to attic and omit waistcoat. Carried. Go down.

Dining-Room. Only Wetherby breakfasting alone, apparently in a great hurry. Windows open. Full view of sea, ships, boats, pier, harbour. Very pretty place, apparently, Torquay. Fine day, too. Wetherby (in full yachting costume with brass buttons) answers, "Yes. Help yourself." The Ladies, he informs me, will be ready to go on board about Eleven.

WONDER to myself where we are going to for a cruise? Wetherby rings a bell hurriedly. Robert appears. Wetherby asks Robert where Bill is. [Bill. This sounds nautically rough. Perhaps the Pilot. If a Pilot, this promises well for a lengthened cruise. Icebergs, North Pole in view. Also Esquimaux. Wonder how my Aunt would like to be among the Esquimaux. How an Esquimaux seen for the first time, would make her jump.] Bill, it appears, is in the passage, and being told to come in, does so. He too is in nautical dress of a roughish character. [Just what I expected, but looking too young for a Pilot.] Wetherby is brisk and sharp in his questions. "Has Bill seen to the boat? Was she painted?" He has seen to her, and yes she was.

Whereupon Robert is summoned suddenly. Being only outside the door, [Note. I find that Wetherby's servants, as a rule, never go much farther than outside the door, being liable to be summoned at any moment, sharply, and it being as much as their place is worth to be out of the way when called. On the whole, quite right ; reminding one, however, of the Arabian Nights, where somebody Eastern claps his hands and a hundred ebon slaves instantly appear. By the way, how large the doors must have been] he reappears instantly. "Send for the Boy," is the order he receives. Bill remains silent, and evidently waiting orders. Wetherby looks out of window. "Wind, S. by S.E.," says Wetherby, after a while, to which Bill wisely assents. Is the boat ready? Yes, it is. "Hey, what?" says Wetherby, and Bill repeats his information. "I shall want both the boats," says Wetherby. [Mental Observation. Both boats. Then putting this and that together, and considering that Robert has told the Captain, and that we shall want two boats, it does look like a cruise. Perhaps to the Coast of France or Spain. So glad. To either for nothing.] "Is Bunter there?" asks Wetherby, quickly. Yes, Bunter had just come in. "Tell Bunter, then, I want him." Bill is going, but stopped by Wetherby continuing, "And don't you go"—hurriedly again to him—"don't you go," as if he's still got something of the last importance to say to Bill, which he must not come out with before Bunter, or perhaps before me. Wetherby walks up the room—I'm breakfasting quietly—and then walks down the room. Then he looks out of window ; then he pulls his head in, and asks, always sharply and brusquely, if I'm a good sailor.

That's just what I asked myself when I first thought of accepting his invitation. If I say I am, it may turn out I'm not (for I haven't been to sea in a sailing-vessel for years, and forget the effect), and if I say I'm not, it mayn't be true, and perhaps he won't take me.

Safe to reply, "Well, I'm not quite certain. It depends."

Wetherby looks at me, and says, inquiringly, "Hey? What?" and I repeat, smilingly, "Well, it depends." Upon which he repeats, "Hey? What?" again, as if my answer had slightly irritated him; and at this juncture enters Bunter. Bunter is a biggish, broadish man, also in nautical costume, but of a rougher description than Bill's, who has returned, and is now standing behind him. Bunter has a shy way of looking at you, as if he was intensely enjoying some private joke of his own which he won't tell, and is apparently always restraining himself by a great effort from winking at you, to intimate that he knows all about it whatever it is, and sees through it with half an eye. At first sight I like Bunter, and wouldn't mind going with him to the North Pole. Bunter, I feel sure, wouldn't speak, but he'd bring you safely out somewhere. If ever a first lord of the admiralty is wanted as a practical man, my lords have only got to come down to the Sylphide, and select Bunter.

Note of Observation.—Wetherby must have a quantity of retainers. I've seen Robert, Bill, Bunter, and heard of "The Boy" and "The Captain" up to the present moment.

"O Bunter—ah—yes," says Wetherby, disjointedly, as if he hadn't expected his arrival, and was, on the whole, rather taken aback by it. Bunter's right eye is on me, as much as to say, "Ain't this fun? Ain't this here a good lark?" but not a wink, not a sign from this admirable sailor. "Yes—let me see"—Wetherby considers for half a minute or so, and then asks, "Wind S. by S. E., eh?" Bunter replies humorously, at least one can't help feeling that everything he says is humorous, "Yes, he should think there was some east in it." Whereupon Wetherby returns "Hey, what?" and Bunter, after repeating his observation, looks at me, as much as to say, always with a strong sense of the humour of the situation, "Have I committed myself, eh? Ain't this a real good joke?" but he doesn't go into convulsions of laughter over it, in fact, he scarcely smiles, except with his eye, and I notice that it's the right eye he generally uses for the purpose. On considering this by myself, I find that the right eye is easier to wink, and therefore there's more credit to Bunter in keeping it so well under control. Give Bunter a holiday and he'd wink for six weeks. Some men have the habit of talking to themselves without knowing it. Bunter's habit must be winking to himself, knowingly, and thoroughly enjoying it. Up to this moment I am unable to see what particular object has been gained by this review of nautical strength, and I can't make out to what departments they each severally belong. Bunter has something of a man-at-the-wheelish or stokerish air about him. If it's a steam yacht I'm finished off at once. Robert returns. With the boy. The boy is about eighteen (I should say), and each comes in looking very serious, as if he expected to receive his instant dismissal. The boy is not in nautical dress, being in top-boots. Bunter's left eye takes in the top-boots, and his right is simply in ecstasies of laughter (directed towards me) as if Bunter was shouting out, "Ha! ha! ha! Top-boots at sea! Ha! ha! O, ain't this a real prime joke!" but not a word, not a movement from Bunter.

The introduction of this new element, i. e. the top-boots, seems to change the current of Wetherby's thoughts. "Bring the trap round," says Wetherby. Exit boy, respited. This almost looks as if we are going out driving, not yachting! I haven't come three hundred miles to take a drive, in a trap, with a boy! He is called back sharply by Wetherby. He returns.

"In half an hour," says Wetherby to the Boy. "Yes, sir," says the Boy, going. "Hey, what?" shouts Wetherby. Boy returns and replies that he understands perfectly, and will have the trap round in half an hour. Pause after the departure of the Boy. Wetherby impulsively hails a sailorly-looking man from the window. "Jim!" Jim, in reply to questions rapidly put, informs him that he has got the mutton and the ducks, and that altogether he has enough to last. Bunter's right eye catches mine (for I can't help looking at him with an implied confidence in his opinion) at the mention of Ducks, and says as plainly as an eye can say anything, "Capital! good cook on board! Ducks and green peas! Ain't this a game! Hooray for Wetherby! For myself, I now see before me exactly what my Health requires—a good sea-voyage. Wetherby suddenly asks Robert, "Where's Ranger?" And being informed that he is up-stairs, orders Robert to order Ranger to bring his (Wetherby's) cigar-case.

Bunter now requests to know if he's wanted any more. No, not now, but will be. "What time, sir?" asks Bunter, respectfully (but always humorously). Wetherby doesn't know—will send. Bill is to have the boat ready, and to tell Robert something which Robert is to tell Ranger. So the retainers leave us. Wetherby lights a cigar. A fresh-coloured person, with light hair and a straw hat of the same colour as his hair, looks in at the open window. The new-comer observes that he is going out in the Atalanta, and wants to know what we are going to do. Wetherby replies, briefly, "Trawl," and introduces me. (It sounds like, "You see, my dear sir, he (myself) is here, and that's why I'm going to trawl.")

Mental Note.—Trawl? Something in the fishing line, I think. But if so, then we are not going for a cruise. If not, why all these preparations? why this summoning of retainers? why the boats? why the mutton and the ducks?

Conversation continued at window. "You'll have a little breeze for that," light-haired man opines. He has the word Atalanta on his hat-riband, and is evidently an authority.

"Not much," says Wetherby, shortly; then adds, "south by sou'-east."

"Yes," replies the Atalanta man, promptly but vaguely, and evidently intending to give the subject his consideration, "there is some east in it."

Note. This appears to be quite a regular nautical phrase. It's safe, as an opinion, committing you to very little, and quite consistent with an entire change of weather.

The Atalanta man looks out to sea, looks in at the window, then observes, "There's a fairish lop outside."

Flash of Thought. A lop. By this expression I am, as it were, brought for the first time really face to face with the sea practically. I almost feel inclined to say, "If there's a lop, Wetherby, we'd better not go." But I remember that I have come down for my Health, and a "Fairish Lop outside" may be exactly the remedy I want. The word "outside" reminds me that there are two sides to every question. If there's a "Fairish Lop" outside, what will be the effect? . . . No, I must remember I am here for my Health.

Wetherby replies that he supposes there is a fairish lop, but doesn't seem to have any great opinion of it, either on its own account, as a lop, or on anybody else's. Pause.

Wetherby observes to Atalanta man, "I hear you were all ill the other day. Hey? What?" and then shakes with laughter. Laughter not loud but deep, and shaking upwards.

Second Flash of Thought on this subject. These are regular yachting-men, with hats and ribands, and belonging to yachts, and yachts to them; yet "they were all ill," Wetherby has heard. I listen to this with interest. Wonder if I've eaten enough breakfast? or too much? Another chop? Ahem! "Lop outside." Lop rhymes with chop. Lop outside, chop . . . but . . . no; I'll leave it to chance. Odd though that the word lop should have struck me so much, because it was a word terminating in "op" that upset my Aunt. Is it possible that this antipathy runs in the family after a certain age? Think it out.

Conversation continued. Atalanta looks sheepish, and then explains that only one of his party had been ill, and as for himself, he (Atalanta's owner probably) had been unwell before he went on board.

Third Flash. Excellent notion. To complain of being unwell before I go on board. Then if I turn out to be a good sailor, why the sea will have cured me. If the discovery is forced upon me that I am a bad sailor, then I can refer every one to the fact of my having complained of being unwell before I came on board.

ENTER Miss Janie Straithmere. Yachting dress, blue serge, sailor's collar, sailor's knot, nautically-coloured shirt, very much en évidence at the wristbands. Fair hair stacked on the top of her head, relieved, artistically, as to colour, by the occasional appearance of a black hair-pin, and on the top of the hair-stack, a small thatching of straw in the shape of an inverted cheese-plate, with a wide blue riband round it, with two silver-trimmed ends flying, the whole being labelled, in front of the hat, Sylphide. I am so taken aback by this vision of light that I have nothing to say. Thinking of it afterwards, I perceive that I missed an opportunity of making a complimentary allusion to Sylphide and Syren, all in one. On second thoughts glad I didn't say it, as it might have sounded like comparing her to the Double-headed Nightingale.*

* At that time exhibiting in London. As the "Nightingale" was a young lady "of colour," the simile would have been, on the whole, the reverse of complimentary. Sometimes Second Thoughts are best.

She is enthusiastic on the subject of the weather, and has some twenty inquiries to make about all sorts of things of Wetherby. She is most impulsively playful, and, when in a room (unless engaged deeply in a novel or a letter), is either rushing to the window to look at something, patting refractory hair-pins which won't stay in the stack, or regarding herself in the glass to see if something or other (Heaven knows what, or where) is all right, rushing out and up-stairs to get something, or preparing, having just come in, to go out again immediately for something else which is apparently of the utmost importance.

"O!" she exclaims, suddenly. "I must get a pair of gloves." Here she opens her eyes archly, and looks at me. "I've got no gloves. Isn't it dreadful?" She has a way of saying "Isn't it," which arrests my attention. It is a pretty way. [Note. Considering this afterwards coolly, I repeat that it is a pretty way at first, but a trifle irritating after a week of it.] She seems to take a low note to commence with, then ascends in the scale in a sort of triple time, intensifying the question. To put it as a versifier, I should say that her "Isn't it dreadful," forms the last two feet of a hexameter, dactyl and spondee, thus—

Isn't it dreadful?

And then she throws her eyes gradually up and then lets them fall on mine, as if she was adding each time, Am I not an Arch Thing? Don't I look you through and through? Ain't I fascinating? Ain't I all your fancy painted me? Can you resist my Archness?

It occurs to me that if Bunter's eye were here, wouldn't it enjoy this? Wouldn't it say to me, "Isn't this a game, eh? Ain't this here no end of a lark?"

Mem.—I recollect a mysterious story of Lord Lytton's (I think), where a man is pursued by Eyes, which eventually wither him up. Bunter's eye wouldn't, but Miss Janie's—ah! . . .

Flash (quite a lightning Flash.) Am I the fascinator? Or are we both fascinators. Sympathetic Fascinators meeting for the first time. This is a sort of experience one would not meet with while staying merely with my Aunt and Doddridge.

Flashes leading to sudden impulsive resolution. Been too much of a Hermit lately. Cultivate female society more. Thinking of Notes for my History of Motion and Theory of Precognisances, has made me too much of a thinker. By comparison with Miss Janie, I find how very grave I must have become. She appears to me to be a trifle too volatile. Perhaps frivolous people have spoilt her with compliments and rapid conversation. To make an impression on her . . . (Ah! do I already detect myself wanting to make an impression. No, I don't like this) . . . I mean to try and give more weight to her character, which I am sure is all she needs; I will converse with her as with a sensible man. She is as flighty and jerky as a kite; to steady her she only requires a tail. I will be, as it were, the tail.

To myself, while getting my hat in the hall. Why all this interest? Do I . . .

Miss Straithmere wishes to know if there is time for her to go and buy some gloves? Wetherby says there is. "Is there?" asks Miss Janie, "really? Is there really time?" She puts this question so touchingly, as implying that her experience of men has taught her to repose no confidence in them, even in the most ordinary dealings. Wetherby replies, "plenty," and asks me, "Will I go with Miss Janie to the glove shop, and then see her safely on board."

She turns at once to me, and throws the full light of her eyes on me as she says, "Will you be so good? Are you quite sure it doesn't bore you?" with great emphasis on 'quite,' and increased emphasis on 'bore.' I reply, restraining my feelings, that to be her escort will give me the greatest possible pleasure. And we go out together. I, and this fair-haired enthusiast. Note.—It comes to me that her conversation consists chiefly of interrogatories pathetically emphasised, or to put it in a more intelligible form, it consists of sentimental conundrums.

Note.—Is she like this (I mean all eyes and emphasis) with everyone, or is it only with me, and this for the first time. The eyes of passers-by are upon us. On her and me. And her eyes. . . . Un regard incendiaire. . . . The passers-by, having passed by, seem to turn, and say, "What a fine girl! . . . A well-matched pair! . . . What a happy fellow! . . . She is going on board his (my) yacht. . . . Who is she? . . . Who is he?" . . . I feel that I could stop to punch all heads with eye-glasses. I feel that to start a subject of conversation which shall at once lift me above the level of all her former admirers, is not easy, but ought to be done. If I remain silent, she'll think me stupid, and if I don't interest her, she'll become interested in the young yachtsmen (puppies!) who are lounging about in all sorts of fancy costumes. I feel that not only she, but everyone else, is listening to me. Odd: I can't fish up an abstruse subject; and to plunge abruptly into politics, by asking her, suddenly, "What's your opinion on the Corn Laws?" or, "Do you think the Ballot Bill will be passed this Session?" might lead her to imagine that I was laughing at her. And then she might cry.

Mum.—I recollect a mysterious story of Lord Lytton's (I think,) where a man is pursued by Eyes, which eventually wuther him up. Bunter's eye wouldn't, but Miss Janie's—ah! . . .

This question so touchingly, as implying that she has never been taught her to repose no more on the most ordinary dealings. We little

And in the street, too! My Aunt would, I know. While I am thinking, as we walk along, I'm almost sure I see her catch some young man's admiring gaze (I never saw such staring, impudent, conceited . . . I believe it's the yachting dress does it), and then half-glance at me—then look down at the pavement; the glance at me implying, "If you don't talk, I must find some one who will!" I must speak! About what? No matter. I plunge in.

Flash of Thought, suggesting a Subject.—The Sea.

I observe, "How beautiful the sea looks this morning, doesn't it?"

She returns, "Yes. Isn't it Bēāūtīfūl?"

I reply, "Yes, it is." Then, with a slight reflection of her enthusiasm, and having nearly exhausted the subject, that is, without bringing poetry in, I add, "It is Lovely!"

(Evident Continuation of Dialogue).—"You're fond of yachting, Miss Straithmere?"

"O, I think it too charming! quite too charming! Don't you?" I reply, with enthusiasm slightly toned down in consequence of not yet clearly knowing what sort of a sailor I may turn out to be, that "I do; yes, it is—delightful," and I hope I shall find it so. She then goes on, "My brother has a boat at Cowes."

Note.—Her Brother. This, as it were, chills my ardour. I notice that, if you are anything of a lover, the mention of a Brother does chill your ardour. He immediately becomes something to be got rid of. I feel inclined to reply, "I really don't care what your Brother has. Don't bring in your Brother to me, as a threat, as much as to say, 'If you go too far, Sir, there's my Brother!'" Not being tall myself (tall enough, though, and some people I have known have said that they preferred—far preferred—my height to any other)—not being tall myself, for Miss Straithmere to mention her Brother at the outset, sounds as if she wished to twit me with my stature. I don't exactly know why, except that intuitively I feel that if he is mentioned as a warning, he must be (to have a deterrent effect) six feet high, and strong in proportion.

I disguise my feelings, and reply, carelessly, "Indeed! Do you often go out with him?"

"O no. Though I should like to, very much. He's such a nice fellow. He's in the Fusileers. I'm sure you'd like him very much."

She divines my instinctive enmity to all of her race who might come between her and me.

I can only say that "I'm sure I shall;" feeling that I should hate the very sight of him, and rather hoping to hear of some accident to him out at sea, or that he'd been ordered off (he and his confounded Fusileers) to the Cape of Good Hope.

Keeping up this interesting topic, I remark that "it's a pity, as her brother's got a boat, that she can't go out oftener." She can't, she answers, because of Grandmamma, who always wants her to be with her. The mention of Grandmamma softens me. I feel more kindly towards her relations; because, if she has to attend to Grandmamma, like little Red Riding Hood, only without the wolf of course, she must be more or less an orphan. [Note. Odd, too, I never can think of orphans without fitting them (in imagination) with white caps and blue dresses, and mittens, and connecting them with singing loud in church and an asylum. What the association of ideas is I don't know, but it seems to me, on analysis, to be a notion between Hanwell and the Foundling.] I don't like to put this question at once, "Are you an orphan?" nor do I like to say, "There—tell me all about your family at once, and have done with it. Only don't keep on bringing 'em out one by one, and surprising me."

Mental Mem.—To get Lady Wetherby alone, and ask her. Diplomatic and delicate. This I decide while she is within, purchasing her gloves.

HERE is Wetherby on the quay, beckoning to us. As we return, I venture a deeper subject—something that will lead up to—Well, I don't exactly know what.

I say, with just a souffçon of bitterness in my tone, as of one who had tested the emptiness of all earthly enjoyment and was giving it up gradually, "I suppose, Miss Straithmere, you are very fond of gaiety?"

Half turning her head towards me under her parasol, looking at me archly (always archly), and with an inquiring sort of glance out of one eye that reminds me of the knowing, sideways look of a parrot when he's puzzled by a new tune your'e whistling to him, she replies, "Why?"

I am posed. I admit to myself that my question was too general, but I had expected it to serve the purpose by leading her on to say where she'd been lately, what she'd been doing, with whom she'd danced, what sort of things and people she liked, and so forth. I did not expect "Why?"

"Why?" I return, and can't help being a little annoyed, because to ask "Why?" in this manner does seem to me such frivolity, as if she didn't want the trouble of talking, but wanted me to go on, and amuse her. Her "Why" is the abbreviated form of the sentimental conundrum.

"Why?" I return—"Well——" Then I decide upon framing my reply thus, and do so: "Do you mean, 'Why' do I suppose that you are fond of gaiety?"

"Yes. Why?"

"Well——" I consider. I don't like to say, "Well, because your hair, your manner of using your eyes, because your walk; because, in fact, I feel that——"

At this moment Robert runs up to us. "Mr. Wetherby says, Sir, he can't wait any longer. The boat's alongside."

But for the voyage! . . . Good gracious! I am not prepared. I say to Robert, hurriedly, "Are my things——"

"All on board, sir. I've taken them."

It flashes across me suddenly to ask, "Is my umbrella there?" but I don't, because he might laugh, or being too well trained for that (first-rate servant in everything is Robert, except that he will fold my dress things inside out, and so make me late for dinner), he might tell the other sailors quietly, and they'd invent some nickname for me among themselves—"Mr. Umbrella," perhaps. Bunter's eye would enjoy the joke.

We get into the boat, and are on our way to the Sylphide. "Farewell, England!" I say, merrily: whereat Wetherby frowns. I look round, to catch Bunter's eye: he is not there. The men are paying no attention to anything except their stroke ; and Robert is in the bows with some rugs, also looking serious.

I have a mind to whisper to Miss Straithmere, "He is in the bows, looking stern;" but if she doesn't understand the nautical terms, it will be thrown away. Better keep it, and put it down to Sydney Smith or Sheridan, or why not to my Aunt?"

Flash of Real Genius.—Put everything down to my Aunt. Make her out the wittiest, funniest, cleverest woman ever met with by anyone anywhere. I can be constantly regretting that she won't publish her witticisms, and her cynicisms. People will say, "What a clever person she must be," and how they'd like to meet her. Then I'll make her out to be quite a Recluse, The Recluse of Ramsgate. At this point, perhaps, I'd better stop, or else everyone would be going to Ramsgate to get a look at her. All the same if done quietly at so much a head it might be a fortune. Flies, omnibuses, and cabs from the station up to the Crescent where she lodges. People standing on the roofs of the vehicles to get a look at her, others hanging on by the railings in front of the garden on the chance of hearing something funny or witty from her as she walks round. A sharp man like Barnum would have done this and realised thousands. I can't. But still I'll stick to the idea of talking of her as the wittiest, cleverest, &c., because it will, I see, reflect favourably on myself.

In the Boat, Wetherby steering. The men seem to place infinite confidence in Wetherby, as they never look a-head to see where they're going. I notice that they are evidently remarkably fond of Wetherby, and when they "give way," as he tells them to do, they "give way with a will."

[Conundrum to put by and keep for future use, perhaps to cheer them on a Saturday night at sea during the voyage, or if we're becalmed. "When is a" (on second thoughts I'll put it, "Why is a")—Why is a Sailor a most self-sacrificing person? Because he's always giving way. On further consideration alter "always" to "so often." Turning it over once more in my mind, I ask myself is it good? Because a sailor, except when rowing in a small boat, does not "give way." The point of the conundrum being, after all, a matter of fact, personal observation during our cruise will settle this. If I think there's any risk about it, I can always put it down to the Bishop of Oxford, or give it out as "one of my Aunt's latest witticisms."]

In view of the Sylphide. Very pretty vessel. Awkward word "vessel." Sounds like cant. Before I express my opinion aloud, decide whether to use vessel or ship. Neither. Yacht, of course. Will make a quotation later on, "She walks the waters like a thing of life." Anything more unlike walking than the movement of a ship I can't imagine. Skims is better, and would be perfect, if it didn't suggest milk. She (the ship) skims the water. But milk is skimmed, not water. On the whole, keep the quotation to myself, and object to it if said by anyone else.

Near the Yacht.—Somebody in a puggaree on board waving his handkerchief. Miss Straithmere returns it with her hand, and looks sprightly and pleased. Hate the puggaree man on the spot. Wish I had one on, as it strikes me that the puggaree has a great deal to do with his effect on Miss Straithmere. She exclaims joyfully, "O! there's Captain Dawson! I'm so glad he's coming. He is so nice. Do you know him?" No, I don't. I reply with what I may term studied carelessness, implying that whether I ever do know him or not is a matter of the most perfect indifference to me. I class him there and then with Miss Straithmere's brothers, &c., and hate the lot, instinctively. She asks Wetherby, in a tone of much interest, if Major Felton is with him? No, he's not, Wetherby answers. This is a relief: I don't know exactly why; but I feel that Major Felton would have been in the way.

Alongside.—Sailors and Captain in waiting. Puggaree there in readiness to assist Miss Straithmere. Pretty fluttering agitation on her part. "Will somebody"—a sailor in the boat tenders his shoulder as a support, and she accepts it. The man is stolid, apparently, but thrilled. Too well drilled (under his Captain's eye too) to show emotion.

Rhyming Inspiration :—

He's too well drilled
To show that he's thrilled.

She has not yet finished her preparation for getting out. "Will somebody——?" Yes, I am there. I will—whatever it is. Take her cloak and sunshade. I do so gloomily, while Puggaree above gives his, and takes her, hand. Is there a pressure? Is there a—— "Now then!" says Wetherby, "look alive!" I hand Miss Straithmere's impedimenta to the Captain, and step up the ladder, refusing proffered assistance.

On Board.—Lady Wetherby, another lady, and a tall gentleman, the Captain, the Crew, and Bunter, with his eye wide open, and saying expressively, "Ain't this a Life on the Ocean Wave, eh? Rule Britannia, and Hooray for Wetherby!" Beautifully-appointed yacht. Everything white, bright, and shining. The spirit of Hornpipes seems to be upon me as I stand on the deck. For a moment I forget my hates and likings, give up Miss Janie to Puggaree, or anybody, and enjoy the novelty, not as a novelty, but as if it were a return to a previous state of enjoyable existence. Yes! here is health at last. No doubt of it. And really—not the slightest motion. But then, on second thoughts, I suppose we are still at anchor. I feel that I could do all the steps without a master. It seems, at the first moment, that a sailor's life is the life for me ; that I have wasted my life hitherto, and ought always to have been on board something or other. I now call to mind, how, in my childhood, I was fond of pirates and buccaneers [we played at being these, somehow, with hoops, which, I rather fancy, were intended to represent our ships], a calling which, at nine years old, I should have liked (I recollect) to have followed professionally, but I think my Aunt was against it. As no one seems exhilarated except myself, I retire to the side ("bulwarks," I think), lay hold of a rope, and hum, in an under-tone, as much of the Sailor's Horn-pipe as I can remember. "Rule, Britannia!" to follow. We are starting.

We are on Board the Gallant Sylphide.—We have everything that can possibly be desired. Still I do not see, and remark this instantly to myself, such preparations for a sort of Hardy Norseman's cruise as I had expected.

Note.—The instance of the Hardy Norseman occurs to me because, as the song says, "his House of yore was on the rolling sea," with every kind, therefore, of residential accommodation in a roughish way. There are on deck the most comfortable chairs, the thickest rugs, the softest cushions, and everyone can be provided with a footstool and a sunshade if they want it.

My umbrella is on board. Thoughtful Robert has brought it as a sunshade. Bah ! no shades for me : let me be browned—done on both sides, from the shirt-collar line upwards. There are wraps, coats, and waterproofs. Nothing has been forgotten. We are, apparently, ready for the Tropics, or the North Pole.

Down-stairs—I mean “below”—there are a ladies’ cabin, a gentlemen’s cabin, a dining saloon, a piano, a fire-place, and the brightest possible fire-irons, all complete; a luxurious hearth-rug, book-cases, highly polished lamp; on swivels, sofas, lounges, and chairs of all shapes and sizes. The floor is beautifully carpeted, and, on the whole, it is the nearest approach to being in your own drawing-room on shore that any arrangement can be, out of it. The Hardy Norseman would be evidently quite out of his element here: his element being the stormy deep, and no carpets.

Note.—After a little experience (this note being interpolated later on) it occurs to me that the chief aim and object in going out yachting is to remain as much like being on shore as possible, with the advantage of having it in your power, when you are tired of the imitation, to return to the genuine article at a minute’s notice. Except for the look of the thing, and, occasionally, the feel of the thing, I could, without any great effort of imagination, fancy myself in Number Something Firkin Terrace, Torquay. To a person who was fond of yachting luxuriantly but unable to afford the amusement, I should recommend sitting at the end of some pier in an arm-chair, and dressed of course (this is absolutely indispensable) in a nautical costume. If the arm-chair is impracticable, a bath chair can be obtained, and he would enjoy all the pleasure with the minimum of internal discomfort; though, if of a very delicate make, he can experience even this.

On Board, off Torquay.—A lovely day, bright blue sky, Prussian blue sea, red cliffs, white houses of the very plainest possible design, as if a lot of semi-detached Cockney villas and “Eligible Residences” had, with a view to getting a breath of fresh air, broken loose from the builder’s hands, got down somehow to the coast of Devon, and, having started for a race up the heights, had stopped, in a white heat, to rest themselves on various points of the ascent, and, not having felt inclined to move up any higher, had allowed the highest of the party to win the race, and perch itself on the top.

Flash across my mind of adaptable and opportune quotation.—"Heaven made the South Coast, Man made Torquay." Think this out, and arrange it epigrammatically. Something in it, like lead in an uncut pencil, but the point, as yet, not clear. All this, as I stand alone by the bulwarks, and begin to feel that if there is no more motion than this (and Torquay is fast receding from sight), I shall be all right, and shall be able to get on without calculating every step on the deck, and stand by the bulwarks, without laying hold of a rope.

Another large yacht is alongside. The crew are all in blue, with red woollen caps (or red something caps), like draymen.

Perhaps one of Barclay and Perkins's yachts going out with beer.

Flash of Invention.—Why not start such a company? A Floating Brewery!! Bass's Barque! Lots of people must get thirsty at sea. Say that ships' stores run short, then imagine their delight, when, with a loud cry, they hail the well-known flag of Barclay and Perkins's ship—a two-hundred casker—and coming alongside, broach kegs of single, double, and treble X, pay four times the amount for it, as a luxury, to what the charge would have been on shore, and then away to the Southern Seas, or wherever they're going, refreshed and happy, and blessing the good stout craft of Barclay and Perkins's Entire!

Motto for B. & P.'s Flag: "The Sailor's Necessity is B. & P.'s Opportunity."

More Flashes.—The idea doesn't stop here. Why not suggest it to those enterprising caterers, Steeples and Lake, and let them start a navy. A Fleet of Refreshment Ships.

With Barmaids on board, and the colours flying. Instead of Barmaids, they might be known by some new nautical name : say, e.g. the feminine of Bargee, Bargeshe. Steeples & Co. could then announce their fine sea-going first-class Refreshment Ship, The Sponge-Cake, manned, or rather womaned, by able Bargeshees.

Also Refreshment Vessels like Lightships, at moorings, and marked in the Admiralty charts.

The idea of the Honourable East India Company's constitution was not grander in its original conception than this. I turn to tell Wetherby what I've hit on.

He is talking to his Captain and the sailors. Bunter is sitting loungingly against the side. Bunter would see this idea of Barclay and Perkins, I'm sure, and be first mate. His Eye is taking everything in. Perhaps for some future Book of Nautical Observations, to be entitled, "My Eye."

Note.—Good title, "My Eye, and what I saw with it."

Wetherby is talking to his Captain. I see Captain Puggaree talking and laughing with Miss Straithmere. She is sitting in a low easy chair flirting with her parasol and with Puggaree, who is stretched on a rug at her feet. I dare say he thinks he looks picturesque. I feel that they are, so to speak, beneath my notice, and that being at sea I shall enlarge my ideas by thoroughly going in for nautical matters. Effeminacy on the one hand is represented to me by Puggaree and Miss Straithmere in the stern ; Rough and Ready Seamanship by the Captain, Bunter, and Wetherby, in the bows. As to Lady Wetherby and the other lady, they are on the opposite side of the stern ("starboard side," I think, but won't venture to say so except as a joke), and are talking quietly on some evidently interesting topic. The choice is between effeminacy at the stern and the Hardy Norseman at the prow.

I notice that the Captain and sailors appear decidedly attached to Wetherby. Perhaps they have seen hardships together. He is brusque and quick with them, but I can't help observing that they seem to like it. Bunter's Eye is taking in the entire conversation between Wetherby and the Captain, and enjoying it.

IN order to catch some details about our projected voyage (for I suppose it will be a “voyage,” and has been “projected”), I go forward and overhear a part of their conversation. Wetherby (who has a large chart rolled up in his hand) is saying, “Hey, what?” to the Captain, who, having probably made the same answer once before, replies, “Yes, Sir, Tom’s still very bad, in hospital;” then he adds, in a sort of bashful way, “He told me to say as he’s very thankful for your kindness, Sir, and —.” Here Wetherby puts his glass in his eye, and interrupts him almost roughly. “Ah—um—well.” Then, very quickly, “Tell him he’s to have whatever he wants; I’ve ordered ’em to send the bill in to me . . . and—and”—as if with an air of thought—“give his wife that.”—What? The Captain touches his cap, and Bunter’s Eye seems to be aware of a haziness coming over it, which it tries to wink away, while Wetherby continues—"that'll buy something for the children—and—Lady Wetherby says she can come up and do some work for her—and tell her that the doctor says he'll be all right very soon . . ." Here he breaks off and asks sharply enough, "Where's Cripp?" The Captain replies by looking down into the men's cabin below, and calling "Cripp!" whereupon a small boy in sailor's dress and a round rough cap tumbles up and stands before Wetherby, looking about as startled as if his master and the Captain were "going to kill and eat him," being short of provisions. Bunter's Eye, being once more clear, is regarding the boy severely, but always humorously, so as to convey the meaning that Wetherby and the Captain were "only purtendin'," and that he (Bunter) knew it, and could quite enter into the spirit of the thing.

"Well," says Wetherby, frowning, "What are you doing, hey?" The boy fumbles with his cap, and looks up at the Captain, then down at his boots, then (he is a bright little fellow) up again, and replies, "Helping, Sir," with a touch of his forelock.

"Hey? What?" asks Wetherby, who never seems to catch a reply the first time.

"He's lending a hand," says the Captain, good-naturedly; "and if he only keeps out o' mischief, we'll make something of him."

"D'y'e hear that, hey?" asks Wetherby, of the boy.

The boy replies that his present intention is to avoid mischief, and to allow himself to be made something of.

Wetherby surveys the lad for a minute with such a severe frown as suggests to a looker-on that he is debating whether he shall flog him and try him once more, or throw him overboard and have done with him for ever. I conclude that the boy has been (as Budd would say) guilty of some enormity, and am anxiously awaiting his sentence, when Wetherby turns away from him abruptly, looks out to sea, and asks the Captain, "Wind East by South-East, eh?" The Captain returns that "he should say there is a little East in it," and goes to the helm. The boy disappears. Bunter's Eye is lighted up with real enjoyment, and seems to say to me, "Ain't Wetherby a good chap? Eh? Ain't it real fun seeing him puttendin' to be severe? Ain't it all right! Ducks and green peas below! Hooray for Wetherby!" but he does not say a word, and has apparently nothing whatever to do with the working of the ship. I have two things to find out—What has the boy done? What are Bunter's duties?"

"Boy?" exclaims Wetherby in answer to the former of these inquiries, "O! Ah! Yes; sharp chap, ain't he? Found him wandering about the quay, idle, so gave him some work to do." And, dismissing the case, as if the boy were a sore subject with him, he goes to the Captain, at the helm, probably to get a further opinion from him as to the amount of East in the wind at that moment.

Note.—I subsequently ascertain from Lady Wetherby that the boy Cripp was found by Wetherby, crying, having lost his way, and whatever money he had had in his pocket: that Wetherby, understanding from him that he was an orphan, without friends in the world, or a soul to speak to (except a casual acquaintance, a travelling tinker, I think, who had robbed him of his few pence first, and beaten him afterwards), had furnished him with clothes, and delivered him over to his Captain, to be educated for a sailor, and that Cripp was, up to this moment, giving great promise of repaying his benefactor, by turning out quite a nautical Whittington, without the Cat; the Cat, by the way, having been abolished in the Navy.

Good Sign for my Health.—I am getting hungry—very hungry. I notice that, with me, hunger seems to show itself in my chest; perhaps where the chest notes and the ut de poitrine come from. Note this in my Health Diary, because odd.

While noting, it occurs to me that this is not one of my Fat Days. I should call it with me a Thin Day. On a Fat Day I feel as if I'd been dining for years on dumplings, and occasional cannon-balls. At these times I love solitude, and such an easy freedom in dress as we see in the pictures of South American planters. Then Buttons are tyranny. That there should be this difference between one day and another, is clearly not a good condition of existence.

A Flash of Memory.—I met a man in some train, somewhere, who told me that it had been ascertained scientifically or prophesied problematically, I forget which, but hope the latter, that there would be "an entirely new illness in the autumn." I fancy I heard this from some one in the carriage when I was going to sleep, or just awaking, during my journey from London to Torquay. Mustn't think of it again, because nervousness might No Miss Straithmere is turning towards me; she seems to say, "Why so unsociable! why so mute? I've had enough of Puggaree. Come. Yours truly, Janie."

I respond to her tacit invitation with a slight smile. If I was asked now what I meant by that smile, I shouldn't know. It seems to mean (this occurs to me as I approach her) that I am pleased at being summoned. If so, it is simply equivalent to a dog wagging its tail when it catches its master's benevolent eye.

Am I at her beck and call? No. Yet—Bah! I am too serious, too much en philosophe. Puggaree would not be angry with himself for smiling feebly, for, as it were, wagging his tail with pleasure at being noticed. He would not writhe mentally, as I do, to find myself (with aspirations) on an equality with a toy terrier.

All this is unhealthy. I will be gay. I approach her.

"Why don't you come and talk?" she says lightly, lowering her sunshade for a second, so as just to fire at me one glance from under it, unseen by the Puggaree.

Talk!! If I could talk as I like at this moment, I would be an energetic ascetic, and deliver a crushing sermon against flirting, frivolity, and fools. Ah!

"You must come and amuse us," she continues, in the same arch way, and adds with her usual inflexion of tone, "Won't you?"

I am bitter; for a moment, I am bitter. I feel that I don't want to be trifled with. That Puggaree should look at me and smile, seems to me to be a confounded liberty. I shouldn't smile at a man (at least so I think at this moment) unless I knew him.

Subsequent Note on considering Symptoms.—Perhaps incipient or progressive biliousness. So intimate is the connection between mind and matter that a word, out of season, like fruit, also when out of season, produces biliousness.

[Flash in Pocket-book.—Fix this flash of ideas about Words and Fruit. Good simile or parallel in futuro. Words drop; Fruit drops—question of ripeness. A man of "ripe learning." Conundrum in prospect—When ought a student to be plucked? When he's a ripe scholar. Keep this, and ask it when the opportunity arrives. As conversation, now-a-days, turns so much on education, I can, by joining in it, diplomatically, lead it round to my conundrum.]

In answer to Miss Straithmere I can't say "I won't amuse you," brusquely, but should like to, adding, "he (Puggaree) will do it well enough;" but I smile, sarcastically,—[which, on analysis, I find I do with the right corner of my mouth only . . . Invaluable Note.—It's a capital plan to look in the glass and study your own different expressions of countenance. You may, perhaps, discover that what you've intended, for years, as a sarcastic smile, only results in a sort of grimace which makes you appear as if afflicted, suddenly, with one-sided mumps; while a look, which up to the time of your consulting the looking-glass, you'd always supposed to be delicately expressive of sincere admiration, is merely the leer of an over-fed Satyr, and has probably disgusted several people. In consequence of my mirror-inspection I change on Thursday my sarcastic smile of Wednesday, having discovered, that, to be effectively understood as sarcastic, the nostrils should be slightly dilated, at the risk of a sneeze, and the corners of the mouth a trifle depressed.]—I smile sarcastically (old style), and observe, "I didn't think you could want amusement," and could add but don't, "while that ass Puggaree is here."

Miss Straithmere looks down at the tips of her coquettish little boots peeping from beneath her dress, then looks up, then puts her head on one side, brings her eyes to bear on me with a depth of unfathomable meaning, and asks, "Why?"

Simply, most irritating. I should like to retort, "Why what? What do you mean by why?" but I resume my former method with her as quietly as I can, and re-state my own question, as if : had been put by her to me, thus, "Do you mean 'Why didn't I think that you couldn't want amusement?'"

"Yes," she replies, always archly, "Why?" Then she changes the position of her parasol by lowering it over her right shoulder, and looks straight before her out to sea, at nothing in particular, with the air either of being careless as to whether I continue the conversation or not, or of having entirely forgotten her own question.

YACHT sailing swiftly. I will not waste words. I stand by Miss Straithmere and look out over the sea, in the same direction. ["In the same direction" put nautically would be, I take it, "port side of the offing."] So does Puggaree. Presently Puggaree observes something, between us and the offing, and asks Wetherby, "Isn't that the Iris?" This causes Lady Wetherby and her friend to turn; the Captain at the wheel to shade his eyes with his right hand, and regard the object earnestly, as if our existence depended upon her, and she was bringing us water, biscuits, and news of home; home being Torquay indistinguishable now in detail. Wetherby comes up a step higher on the companion, to reconnoitre with opera-glasses.

The Captain decides that it isn't the Iris, but doesn't know what it is. Incident in voyage. Presently we meet her ; she is a small sailing-boat making for shore, and going at a good pace.

The Captain says it's the Osprey.*

Wetherby suddenly remembers something that he wants to say to the owner of the Osprey, so he shouts out, "How did you manage about that burgee, eh?" All of us interested deeply, wondering what the Osprey will say to that. It seems as if the Osprey had got a home-thrust on this question.

Voice from Osprey (coming from a man waving his hat).—

Aw—awly—aw—(or any sounds equally intelligible).

Wetherby and Puggaree (who thinks he must help him, and really only confuses the voices), shout out between their hands, "How about that Bur-GEE?" The voice from the Osprey (very much fainter, in fact the Osprey herself is fast disappearing) replies—"Aw—ly—aw—aw—aw"

We have been all much excited by this interchange of ideas, and now calm down again. Wetherby laughs, and says to the Captain that he supposes that he (the owner of the Osprey) didn't like it.

Whereupon the Captain, keeping a look-out well over Wetherby's head, but smiling as if he didn't mind slightly attending to a passing joke replies, that he, too, "thinks he" (the Osprey man) "didn't much like it, after what was said o' Monday."

At this Wetherby laughs heartily, and we all smile good-

* This name subsequently became very celebrated in 1871, during the "Tichborne Trial." This note is here added in order to assure the reader that the vessel mentioned here had no sort of connection with the other Osprey, and that this chapter of "My Health" will not be brought in as evidence on either side during the next stage of the Tichborne Case.

humouredly and sympathetically, though I am convinced that none of us know what the story of the Burgee is.

Puggaree is looking knowing. Miss Straithmere inquires what Mr. Wetherby was talking about?

"O," says Puggaree, as if he was fencing her question, "it was only something about the other day," and looks more knowing than ever, insomuch that I find myself looking also knowingly at him, and smiling, as much as to say, "This is a subject for us men, ha! ha! I understand." We don't wink at one another, but we mean winking. I am under the impression, until Puggaree removes it, that there is some queer story about a Bargee, called at sea a Burgee. Subsequent explanation shows me that "Burgee" is a flag.

"I don't think you remember me," says Puggaree, evidently inclined to be quite friendly. "My name's Dawson."

"Dawson?" I think to myself, and look at him in bits, as if he was a puzzle, put together wrongly, perhaps, to see if there's any portion of him that calls to mind Dawson. No. I don't recognise him in parts, or as a whole. Oddly enough it flashes across me, in the thousandth part of a second, that my father's washerwoman's second husband was named Dawson (so my nurse, or the Cook, had told me), and he'd gone away to sea, and returned very much tanned, with a velvet waistcoat and glass buttons. [I note this flash, as a flash, showing how a name brings back old memories of things long forgotten. Of course Captain Dawson has nothing to do with this revived fact.

No; I don't remember anywhere a Dawson. Except a small brown boy, with black eyes (generally natural, but sometimes artificial) and a bad hat. Beginning from boots upwards, nothing about him recalls a Dawson. If he'd relied upon me as a witness to his identity, I should have entirely upset his case, or should have fixed him as something to do with the washer-woman. Take him for all in all, I've never looked—— Quotation adapted. Flash mental.—Take him for all in all, I've never looked upon his like before.

He tells me my own name in a rather injured tone, as much as to convey, "Hang it! I remember your name. I think you might remember something of me." Flash. The Dawsonian Theory.

I soften down my utter ignorance of anything Dawsonian by admitting that "I have some sort of recollection . . ."

"Why," says he, reproachfully, "I was at Pixley's with you." Pixley, a private tutor's. O, of course. We shake hands heartily, as if we'd made it up. Our shake of the hands seems to mean, "My dear fellow (mentally), I won't interfere between you and Miss . . . Don't mind me (mentally), old boy—No jealousy—Old schoolfellows—All right—Larks." (Mental winks.)

I really like him: on the spot I could embrace him. I don't know why. I suppose it is that when I left him at Pixley's I said good-bye to him as a lad for ever, and he passed out of my mind; so there's a sort of pleasant surprise in finding that, after a lapse of years, he's managed to come safely out of Pixley's, and appear on board the Sylphide. In answer to my inquiry, he says he was not the brown boy with a bad hat. Wonder if I shall ever meet him?

He is a bright, tall, good-looking fellow.

"I must introduce you to my wife," says he, motioning towards the lady with Lady Wetherby.

Married! With the greatest pleasure will I be introduced to Mrs. Dawson.

"It's years since we met," says he; "and I should hardly have known him now," he adds, turning to Miss Straithmere, "he's got so round and portly."

I could have liked this man immensely, and now—— I hate a fellow that hasn't got more tact.

I reply that I don't think that I am portly—a word hitherto only associated in my mind with Deans, Bishops, Farmers, and Gaiters—"and that," I add, seeing him disposed to smile ironically, "when I tried on my——"

(I substitute "waistcoats" for what I was going to say.)
——"Waistcoats of last summer, I found that they would fit me perfectly." He is still ironical; but I am on my defence, as it were, before Miss Straithmere, and I continue: "I admit," I say, "that I am very much increased in size round the chest." (Here I hold myself en militaire, to show him how easily he has been deceived by appearances.)

Do I deceive myself? Where are those . . . waistcoats? and those . . . waistbands? Did I find one pair I could wear? I'm sure I have got them somewhere, and I'm almost sure that I tried them on with the result just mentioned. Or was it Budd who told me, at Ramsgate, that, after a series of the Cramville's Turkish Baths and Samuel's rubbings, I should be so considerably taken in at the waist as to be of no value to my tailor for the next two years, if sufficiently stocked with old clothes? The subject is suddenly changed by A Noise on Board.—They are getting out a long pole, irons and nets.

Discussion as to suitable place. This spot settled by the discussionists—that is, Wetherby and Captain—to be suitable. Great interest. I begin to be more hungry. Mentioning this, casually, to Dawson, I hear that we don't lunch until half-past one. It is now twelve. I ask Wetherby, "Could I have a biscuit?" "Certainly. Robert! Biscuits aft!" Biscuits come aft, in a can, and Lady Wetherby thinks it a good idea. She is very pleasant, stately, rather more than usual, and does not move from her chair unnecessarily; from which I conclude that her stately bearing has something to do with her not being a very good sailor. Everyone eats biscuits.

With a good deal of struggling and belaying, the weights and the pole and the nets are sent, over the side, into the sea. Miss Straithmere says to me, "Aren't you very fond of fishing?" I should like to answer, "Yes, very—anything with you." I do answer, "Yes," and our eyes meet, mine from below, hers from above, and both shaded from the others by the parasol.

"Will you," she says, "Will you ask for a line for me?"

I will. Whom shall I ask?

Before I can comply with her request, she has impulsively lowered her parasol, and is enthusiastically addressing Lady Wetherby.

"O Lady Wetherby, do let me have a line here! I do so want to fish!"

Lady Wetherby, smiling, sees no objection, if it won't interfere with the trawling on the other side. What we're doing now, then, is "trawling." It seems to have checked our pace, and there's a slight breeze blowing at us. I fancy, too, that the motion has increased. Perhaps I am a little hungry, and the void . . .

There's one thing my medical man, and every medical man I ever consulted, has always told me—"Never go too long without eating." If it was my yacht, I'd order up my dinner now, at once, immediately. It is only 12.15. It seems an hour instead of only fifteen minutes since Dawson said it was mid-day. I feel, too, a sleepiness. Nobody is watching the trawling nets, which, being once overboard, apparently take care of themselves.

DO let me have a line—just a little one," says Miss Straithmere to Wetherby, putting on an infantine way, as if a refusal would send her into tears. "I'll drop it on this side, and be so quiet." To me, "You'll fish, too, won't you? O, do ask! Mr. Wetherby won't refuse you." This at Wetherby.

Wetherby says he doesn't think there are lines ready. The other two ladies continue their conversation.

"O, yes!" returns the fair-haired enthusiast, perseveringly, "I'm sure, Robert" (hitting him with a shot from her eyes, as he comes aft, bringing a stool for Captain Dawson), "I'm sure Robert will get me one."

Wetherby objects that it will interfere with the trawling. Robert irresolute.

"O no, it won't," she cries, impulsively; then, appealingly, to the Captain at the helm, "Will it, Reynolds?" Reynolds smiles, and looking out to sea, so as to avoid the eyes of the syren, is understood to answer that it won't make any difference; whereupon she is off, ecstatically, "There! you hear Reynolds says so. I may have one," coaxingly to Wetherby, "mayn't I?" Dawson smiles, Wetherby smiles, I smile. Then she continues, "Robert will fetch it." Robert smiles.

Robert does fetch it. A long line with hook and bait.

"O it's gone!" she exclaims, with a little scream, as it passes rapidly through her hand and I stop it, triumphantly. I feel as if I'd been overboard and saved her.

"Will you hold it?" she asks in her italicised manner.

"Will you?" Of course I will, it needs no answer: I do. I am holding it, and it is rather cutting my fingers. As I do not reply, she goes on, poutingly, "Don't do it if it bore you? Does it bore you? Do you mind holding it—only a minute—for me?"

For her! Doesn't she see that I am holding it? Doesn't she see from my way of grasping it and concealing the pain which the sharp cord gives me, that I would hold it against twenty whales at the other end if necessary? I merely reply "I will."

"And do catch a fish," she continues. "You will, won't you?" Reynolds and I caught a fish the other day, didn't we?"

This at, more than to Reynolds, who clings to his helm and smiles in a visionary way. He seems to say, "I'm at my duty, Miss, I am : do not, do not speak to the man at the wheel ; it's not fair, it ain't really."

For one moment I turn, and catch Bunter's eye. It says, with contemptuous humour, "Well, I never see such a gal as that. If she was Mrs. Bunter, I'd let her know . . ." But here he is told off to his department in the trawling business.

Bunter's is a rough nature. He has not lived in drawing-rooms.

Thoughts while Fishing.—Would she flirt with anyone, even a man at the wheel? Why does she talk at servants. Can't she get on without admiration from some one, from everyone, from anyone? [I think there is a bite. I haul up. A wet process. Nothing. I let it go again. A wetter process. The sea seems to have sharpened the line as it runs through my hand. It hurts.] If Miss Janie . . . I mean if such a person as Miss Janie was my wife should I like to see her eyes going up at the butler, or seeking for admiration, or approbation, from the buttons? * * * * Perhaps if sobered down she wouldn't do it . . perhaps . . . I am getting very hungry . . . and, it seems to me, a trifle faint. . . . Don't like to ask for more biscuits. I think standing in one position with my eye on the line is not good. To compare "hunger" to "a sharp thorn" is not a happy simile. You feel hunger all over you. This is not the case with thorns. . . . A bite . . . No . . . I am painfully hungry . . . Miss Straithmere is talking to Lady Wetherby on the other side. Why couldn't she stay here? After she's made use of me to hold her fishing-line she leaves me. I will fasten it to the side and sit down. Captain Dawson offers me a cigar. No, thank you. Somehow I don't fancy a cigar. Hunger detests smoking. I say to him sadly, "I shall be so glad when luncheon's ready." He laughs. A smell of cooking is wafted towards us. It seems out of place at sea. I wish we could have the luncheon without the cooking. Only half an hour more, he says. I feel that, somehow, on that half hour hangs my fate. * * * Miss Straithmere crosses to us. "O!" she exclaims, "There is a fish! I'm sure there's a fish! Do pull it up! Won't you?"

I can't rise from my chair to do it. Hunger seems to have suddenly enfeebled me. Captain Dawson will lug the bothering thing up. I don't say this, only "No, there isn't," rather shortly (really, hungrily,) while the Captain operates. Miss Janie goes on, to me, "O! you promised you'd get me a fish!" Then turning round to Lady Wetherby, "O isn't it unkind of him, Lady Wetherby? He" (meaning me) "won't get me a fish." The two ladies smile, and I can't help replying petulantly, "I didn't promise." How could I have promised such a thing? It's too bad of her. I should like to add, "O don't bother,"—even to her—"I am so hungry * * and I feel so * * queer." But no, she doesn't see that I am really unwell, but goes on, archly prattling . . . I begin to hate prattling. "You don't talk?" she says. "Why?" then seating herself, as Captain Dawson turns to Wetherby, and getting, as it were, under her parasol, but not in the least lowering her voice, so that any one may hear, "Why don't you talk to me? Why not to poor little me? Why?"

I can't stand it any longer. "Because," I blurt out, "I'm so . . ."—no, it's rude. I am going to say, "confoundedly hungry," but restrain myself. I substitute, wearily, "I didn't know you wanted me to talk."

She returns simply, "Why?" Pause. "Why? Do tell me why?"

I feel that I am being soured. "Why?" I demand, bitterly. "Why? Because—don't you see, why?" I ask, meaning that my face ought to express hunger, misery, emptiness, and * * * all uncomfortableness.

Strange Symptom.—I am gradually ceasing to be positively hungry, and am becoming negatively empty. "Being hungry" means that one can actively eat. "Being empty," means, I feel, that one is collapsing, and must be passively filled.

"See why?" she repeats, but not in a soft, gentle tone, inaudible to others, as I should like to hear, and to reply in. "No, do tell me, why. Why ought I to see?" I can only express, by a sort of impatient wag of my head, and a roll of my eyes, that it is impossible to explain. I am so hungry, and so empty, and so . . . but if I could only be fed, at once, I should be all right. She continues, just as loud as before, "If you don't want me to sit here, I'll go. Say do you want me to sit here?" Wetherby is looking at us. I remark this to her in an undertone. She replies quite loudly, "It doesn't matter." I say, still in an undertone (and I really do wish she'd go away and leave me quite alone—I don't want anyone), "It looks so odd for us to be together so much." She returns, "Why?" Why!! Good heavens! "Now," she says, "you're angry. O look!" suddenly. "I'm sure there's a fish. Why don't you pull it up? Why?"

Mental Flash of Quotation adapted—

"O woman! in our hour of ease,
Capricious, coy, and hard to please,
When pain and anguish rack our brow—
I wish you wouldn't bother now."

But I keep this to myself. In fact, I have no words. My mouth is too dry for words. Robert announces luncheon. Lady Wetherby will not go below, she observes, smiling, being afraid of the cabin. The fact is, there is a sort of motion. Isn't there? I ask Reynolds. Reynolds replies that there is a slightish lop.

"Lop!" That was the word the Atalanta man used this morning on shore. I never experienced a lop before. It's not a roll, and it's not a pitch; it's concentrated essence of every unpleasant motion on board ship. "If I could only have lunched an hour ago," I say to Lady Wetherby as I commence descending. She smiles. Accustomed to the sea, and perpetually yachting, as she is, I am sure she is affected by this infernal lop.

In the Cabin.—Still lopping. Lopping peculiarly noticeable here.

Flash of Miserable Jest.—Suffering from Lop—allopathy.

They are at luncheon in the saloon. Wetherby is saying, as I enter, that when in the teeth of the wind, and there's a little East in it, there's always a lop out trawling. In fact, it's not a good day for trawling. Ah! thought so. Miss Straithmere is not at table, she is in the ladies' cabin, re-stacking her hair, probably. I feel that her absence, and the absence of the ladies (Mrs. Dawson has not come in yet), is a relief. I shall get helped at once, and not have to wait. I remember suddenly the expression "lack-lustre eyes." Mine, now.

Note.—Trawling is the test of good sailorship. Dawson asks me, "What will I have?" Now I see it, I don't want anything. "If I could only have lunched an hour ago!" I recommence plaintively. The table, being scientifically poised, does not move, but we do on either side of it. We are, as it were, arranged on a see-saw with our dinner between us in the centre of gravity. Sometimes Captain Dawson rises gently a little way above his plate, then he is lowered gradually, and it's my turn to go up.

I give it six turns more for both of us, alternately, to settle my doubts—and unsettle No : one great point is not to think of it.

Roast mutton, boiled chicken (I feel my nose instinctively turning up at the white sauce), Bacon . . . and Peas. The bright green look of the peas is revolting. It recalls fresh paint on country palings. And the smell. I remark that all the windows are not open. It turns out that they are. My head ! "Mutton !" I gasp, shortly, meaning that I'll take some.

I think I am wrong.

"Have some champagne," says Wetherby, heartily.

I press my lips together. I don't want to be talked to for a minute. I am going gently up, on my side. "Champagne"—says Captain Dawson, enjoying himself, and going gently down, on his side—"is a first-rate thing if you feel qualmish."

Is it? Give me—only give me quickly—champagne. I should like a draught. I can only sip it. Now I am going down. I try a bit of mutton. My jaws seem to have become suddenly stiff. My throat closes at the top. At least that's the sensation. The Captain is floating upwards. I feel just the slightest bit better—just the slightest bit (as it were) of mutton, better.

The Ladies! Miss Straithmere dives at my sofa. I am going up again slowly. This is part of the Lop. I can't rise to make room for anyone. "Will I give her some,"—I can't, whatever it is. And I can't explain. Please don't talk to me. . . . Better soon. "O do take some champagne? Won't you?" she goes on archly, and firing glances at this poor enfeebled wreck (myself). [Flash, mental. Idea for Cartoon. Dying Mariner tickled by Mermaids.] I reply in a voice intended to touch her heart, "I don't feel well."

She returns briskly "No? No more do I! I am so ill. O you don't pity me—poor little me." Ill! She's well—very well—and heartless, selfish; she's helping herself to peas. "May I have your bread?" she asks. Again to me (why on earth can't she bother somebody else?) "You won't mind my taking it?"

I shake my head—I mind nothing. No one, now. I am past hope. I am going down, with the Lop, for the last time, I think. Still if I can hold out. . . . I might. Enter Robert from kitchen . . . with A sweet Omelette!! Bright yellow, and red iam, all hot!!

I'll go . . . I'll . . . Don't move—any . . . body . . . for . . .
To the Captain's cabin . . . Alas! poor Captain! . . .
Alone. Lopped effectually. Lopped. Lopped.

MEANWHILE in Captain's Cabin. Uncertainty.

Am I well enough to go up-stairs, I mean on deck, now? . . .

Yes; I think so. I hear the ladies laughing and talking, above. I hear the sailors hauling up the infernal Trawl. Wetherby above sings out to me—I suppose it's to me—“Come up and see the fish we've caught.” I can't answer, and I don't care about fish,—but I am better.

It will be my best plan to go on deck, and make the best of it. I ascend. Very staggy and weak in the knees, resulting in a desire to catch at anything handy for support.

My Manœuvres in the Bows.—Hidden from general gaze by the mainsail. Under cover of this, and protected by their all being engaged in examining the fish, I advance cautiously.

Flash of Thought.—“Comes up groggy, but smiling,”—quotation from sporting account of prize-fights, now out of date. No one notices me. Lady Wetherby and Mrs. Dawson are quite at the stern, well wrapped up, and their feet on stools, to be out of the way of the mess. Deck sloppy on account of the fish. Rhythmical Flash.—Deck sloppy, I'm lippy. Wetherby and Captain Dawson deeply interested in the mess on deck. Miss Straithmere trying to stand on a chair near Captain Dawson, and holding on by a rope.

"O," she is saying, as I approach; "I must hold on by you (i.e. Dawson), or I shall fall." Then turning round towards Mrs. Dawson, as much as to say, "Don't be jealous, I'm but a childish skittish thing, it's only my way," she laughs playfully, and cries out, "O do come and stand here, Mrs. Dawson; won't you, O do. Won't you, Lady Wetherby? It's quite safe."

"No, thank you," returns Lady Wetherby, quietly smiling; "I prefer being here," and the two ladies, sitting together, exchange one glance only, and then they both smile at Miss Straithmere. I think to myself, what do they mean by that smile?

Flash.—Note it down. A work on "Smiles." A Series. Next volume, "Frowns," to be followed by Winks, Nods. But stay . . . isn't this the History of the World? Wonder how a man feels who's going to write a History of the World? When the first idea strikes him, say on waking in the morning, how it must make him jump out of bed. He'd rush at his pens and his paper under boiling inspiration, and commence . . . Title, "The History . . ."—then, perhaps, it would occur to him whether it should be a History of the World . . . or not? If he didn't do much of it before breakfast, he might decide in the negative.

Another Flash.—À propos of "Smiles," I remember a work called Self-Help, by Smiles. Mr. Samuel Smiles. There might be a Life of Smiles, by Thiers, i.e. if pronounced Tears. This to be said as a "sparkler." Arrange it when I feel better.

No more sparklers. I am mooning, and holding on by a rope.

Feeble, but observant. Live things are sprawling about and making a mess on deck with sand and mud, and sea-water. Starfish by hundreds. Dogfish. Fish without names, unknown even to Bunter, who has an eye for everything that looks at all like a savoury morsel. A large sort of oyster, a mild pantomimic oyster, with a name that Bunter knows and mentions.

"Is it good to eat?" asks Captain Dawson.

"Well, Sir," replies Bunter, with a twinkle in his eye expressive of his own enjoyment of the humour in his answer, "you wouldn't care about it. But there's worse things than them kind of oysters," with which he puts it aside, furtively, for his own private meal.

"O!" cries Miss Straithmere, in view of a flat fish, with a mouth capable of putting an end to his own existence by swallowing himself at one gulp, "O! what a horrid thing! O do look, Lady Wetherby! O!" clutching at Captain Dawson's shoulder, "will it bite me? O, how dreadful!"

I smile, sarcastically; that is, I mean it to convey sarcasm. I feel that I am pale, that I am, as it were, a shadow, a mournful ghost, revisiting the deck, and taking a passive pleasure where I was once so actively happy.

Bunter takes the fish by the tail, and holds it up.

"O!" cries Miss Straithmere, and Dawson doesn't move away, but let's her clutch him when she's frightened (or pretending to be frightened—bah! she's no more frightened than I am . . . I look on, still as the Ghost, but in the character of an ironical Phantom, who sees the hollowness of everything that once took him in). Wonder how Mrs. Dawson likes it? and whether Captain Dawson will be called upon for an explanation when he gets home? If so, will ready wit supply him with a "sparkler"?

"O!" she cries, "it will bite me. Do throw it away, Bunter." Bunter's eye smiles craftily. "Bunter doesn't throw away this fish" (says Bunter's Eye) "if he knows it." Bunter (his Eye further explains) being up to one or two tricks worth at least half-a-dozen of throwing it away. No, he holds it up, fondly, by the tail, perhaps to judge of its breeding, as he would of a terrier's, by its not squeaking when in this position, and is evidently satisfied with the catch, so far. Then Miss Straithmere appeals to me. "Do tell him to throw it away! Won't you?" A pause. Then her eyes come down at me from high up above (she's still on a chair), intending, as it were, to scoop my tenderest feelings up and out of me, like the inside of a pomegranate. No, no! I am the shadow of my former self. She is a dream of the past. The Fascination has gone. I am clear-headed, clear-hearted, and sad; which, on consideration, means that I have suffered severely from the Lop, in the Captain's Cabin.

Bunter puts the fish on one side as another delicate morsel. Bunter is regarding a small heap of sandy, dirty, ugly-looking marine creatures with the eye of an epicurean ogre. There are some of peculiarly hard and unwholesome appearance, which Bunter gives me to understand are "anemminies," and which, for eating purposes, might be put down as sea marrowbones,—without the marrow. Anything hideously ugly in the fish line Bunter knows all about, knows exactly how to cook him, where to cut him, what to eat and avoid, and evidently favours the idea in conversation, and in theory, of these things being totally unfit for ordinary human food.

I should not like to join Bunter at dinner. Specially after a Lop.

Flash.—And yet of this stuff (Bunter's stuff, not the fish) Robinson Crusoes are made.

If he were on a desert island, he would never be at a loss for food. I imagine Bunter's diary as I watch the clearance of the net. I suppose Bunter on a desert island.

First Day of Robinson Bunter's Diary.—Boiled some sea-weed. My eye! ain't sea-weed good. Better nor greens, no end. Cook some more. Caught for breakfast a large sort of a kind of a crab, something between a crab and an oyster. Cracked him, and cooked him in his own shell. O, my! Bootiful! Hope there are lots more on 'em. Saw a dogfish. It being dinner-time, I said grace afore meals, and then stuffed the dog-fish with sea-weed, and cooked him in the crab-shell, and ate him hot. Fust-rate! Thought I'd like some sweets after dinner, regular swell style. Found a jellyfish. Ate him. Any Pastrycook might be proud on him.

Supper.—More sea-weed. Made pancakes of starfish. Ate five or six sea anemminies. Little too much sand in 'em. Ate also the last of the large oyster I caught three days ago. While bathing, met a large conger-eel. Conger-eel tried to eat me. Conger got the worst o' that game. Ate him. Werry good. Pickled his head in sea-water. Take him with meals, as a relish.

Note, next morning, by Bunter (still as Robinson Crusoe).—Didn't sleep well. Nightmare. Dreamt as I was being roasted by them sea anemminies, and dogfish barking at me. 'Orrid!

Flash of Joy.—Thank Goodness! Nets up. No more trawling. We are making rapidly for shore. Torquay is re-appearing. Land in sight.

PLEASURES OF YACHTING—NELSON—HIS NOBILITY OF MIND

MENCLATURE—ON LAND—AMERICANISMS—ICES—WHY?
OH, WHY?—RESIGNATION—DETERMINATION—ABSTRAC-

MOORED.—Musical Flash (adapted quotation)—

"When I beheld the anchor weighed,
Sweet was the rattling chain,
To stay on board I was afraid,
But why—I won't explain."

Strange, with all my yearnings for the sea, I feel, now, a certain sort of insecurity until I am once more on shore.

The sea's very well to look at, and the sea side is charming, but once get off the side and on to the sea, the only pleasure is in the Minimum of Discomfort.

[Flash of Discovery.—Now I know exactly what Lop-sided means.]

The best appointed yacht can but attain to this, i.e. the Minimum of Discomfort. It can give you a bed so scientifically poised as to be motionless, like Mahomet's coffin, in mid-air. But then everything around you is moving. You're as likely as not to see the floor of your cabin at your right elbow, then down again, and up at your left elbow. What's the comfort (I don't say use) . . . what's the comfort of having a table immoveable, if you are sometimes hovering over your plate like a nervous hawk, and the next instant sucked, as it were, right underneath it, legs first, as if you were being suddenly dragged away to the lower regions, like Don Giovanni, after supper? What's the comfort of having a fixed lamp, which no motion of the ship can alter, if you yourself, book in hand, are at one minute over it, at another by its side, at another two feet under it?

Standing on deck, and seeing the Dawsons, Miss Straithmere and Lady Wetherby go off in a little boat, I put these (as they appear to me) posers to Wetherby.

He replies, "Eh? What?" I repeat my posers.

Wetherby observes that after two or three trips I shall be all right: that Nelson was always ill at sea. And then he goes aft.

Thoughtful Flash.—I certainly have read Nelson's history, and never noticed this. It must have been suppressed. Idea for new nautical book, History of the Suppressed Illness of Nelson. How this doubles the nobility of his conduct! England expected him to do his duty. His duty was on board ship, where, so Wetherby says, he was always ill. Yet he did all that England expected, and more, for England didn't expect him to be unwell at sea. I imagine to myself, for one minute, a nautical hero Lopped! He is in the cabin; first mate, second mate, &c. &c., waiting without to receive his orders as to how they are to deal with the enemy's fleet. From within issue the orders, at intervals.

Sudden Flash.—But did Nelson ever go out Trawling?

The boat comes back for me. We take a circuitous course, in and out amongst the yachts, in order to enable Wetherby to make a few calls on some friends in various crafts, who have come in since the morning.

Most of them have come from Dartmouth, which is, so to speak, just round the corner. "Roughish round the Point," says Wetherby, "Eh?"

"Ah!" says the brave yachtsman, "I came by train, and got on board here." Wetherby takes this as quite a matter of course.

One owner says he's going to "The Island."

Well, that sounds like a voyage.

I make this remark. "Yes," he returns, "it's nice enough if you have a fair wind. I shall take the train to Portsmouth, and then cross to 'The Island' in the boat. I shall meet the yacht there."

It strikes me that this sort of amusement is like swimming in shallow water, where you can feel your feet at any moment. There's nothing of 'the Bay of Biscay, O!' in it.

How ill I should be in the Bay of Biscay! Double-lopped. The Island he alludes to is that of Wight.

Query.—Who was Wight?

Recollect the word in old poetry, "Unhappy wight." Same person, perhaps. Must look into this. Really, too, must get to work again.

On the first Landing Step.—After all, there is nothing like land.

I feel I must get restored. I am not exactly hungry, and I am not exactly thirsty. Lady Wetherby and Miss Straithmere are on the quay talking to a tall gentleman, of a rather foreign military appearance, a short gentleman, of a decidedly foreign, but unmilitary, appearance, and a very fresh-looking, bright, pretty girl.

Though I should prefer solitude, I can't avoid the party. Might bow, and go to Firkin Terrace, where I propose the first two of nature's restoratives, cold water and hair-brushes. Lady Wetherby sees me, and smiles in a sort of cheerful way, as one does vaguely on any perfectly uninteresting person, of whom you are uncertain as to whether you had met him the day before yesterday somewhere, or had thought (in a general way) that he'd been dead for years. I respond to the smile, as much as to say, "No, not dead yet," and approach as if prepared to interest myself in their conversation, and solve a difficulty if necessary.

I am introduced. Colonel Blancourt and daughter. American. At least the Colonel is, but his daughter has nothing of what the English consider peculiarly American, except the most sparkling eyes, the most beautiful complexion, and the pearliest teeth. I except these as being (I fancy) peculiarly American.

I seem to throw a damper—perhaps it's my jaundiced appearance does it—over the party. I feel yellow and sticky, and still a shadow of myself.

Flash of Idea.—A Gummy Ghost.

I do not, I am aware, shine. I mentally compare (it is all I can do) Miss Blancourt (if she is Miss Blancourt) with Miss Straithmere, who is two shades lighter than usual, owing to the salt water. I think, in colour, at this moment, she is the reflection of myself, only fainter.

There is, I imagine, a sort of green haze about us both, as if we were neither of us, as yet, quite fit for shore life. I notice, however, that the little Frenchman (Count de Something—couldn't catch the name) is struck, chancelé, by Miss Straithmere. I can see it at once. I know, and recognise the symptoms.

Colonel remarks, with a touch of nasality, or nationality, not unpleasant, rather the contrary, considered as a change, "I've suffered myself. You" (to me) "want something to pick you up and set you on end again." I admit it. What shall I take?

"Well," he says, "I speak from experience, and know the whole thing down to dots. You'd better soup. And if you feel like brandy cold with a lump of ice in it—that's," turning to Lady Wetherby, "the best thing for your friend, ma'am."

I don't "feel like soup," nor "like brandy iced." I observe that if I feel like anything, I "feel like" ice.

"Well," says the Colonel, "you can't do much better than ice. Only don't wait. There's the bar—the Confectioner's—round the corner."

I bow, and am going. Advice and ice.

"O, I'll take an ice!" cries Miss Straithmere. "You won't mind my going with you, will you? I may go, mayn't I, Lady Wetherby?" Then to me, archly, and sending an eye-shot right into the Count's heart [his eyes return imploringly, "Ask me. Si tu savais que je t'aime!"]"—"You won't mind me coming with you, will you?" Of course not, I say. I can't help catching Miss Blancourt's look of infinite amusement. What does she think? Does it strike her, from this irrepressible style, that we are . . . that we—I mean Miss Straithmere and I—are more to one another than . . .

No; I hope not.

"Ha ha," to myself, bitterly, "does not Miss Blancourt see that I am only being played off against the Frenchman." And I . . . On my honour, if Miss Straithmere will only take me into her confidence, I would help her to secure this distinguished foreigner. I could give her away with pleasure. I feel that the Frenchman must have no time allowed him for thought. He sees her . . . is knocked over by her . . . and does not recover his senses until he's married to her. That's my plan. Suivez nous, M. le Comte, chez Confectioner. He does not follow.

We go off together, to "ice,"—I and Miss Janie.

Thoughts as we walk.—There are several feet between us.

This morning we were close together.

Since then, though . . .

Flash of Thought (leading to suggestion to her).—"Wouldn't you like to go to the house first?"

She looks at me, using one of her piercing, fascinating glances (but with point blunted, and the glitter dulled now), and she replies, "No, why?"

Why? Always why. Why on earth (this all to myself) will she always say "why?" Why! Doesn't she understand that I want to be alone?

Second Flash (leading to rather a sulky tone).—"Ah! . . . then . . . I think I'll go to the house first." . . . I turn and pause. She turns, and pauses. I add, politely, "I'm sure you must be tired."

"No. Why?"

Why again. I can't conceal my impatience.

"We will go in first," I say; and add, "I'll go up to my room."

"Very well," she returns, "I'll wait: down here"—that is, on the promenade before the door. I wish it were not rude or brutal to say, "Miss Straithmere, you waste your time with me. Go to the Frenchman. I want to be alone." Would she cry, or faint, or what?

Flash.—Is there a back-door? Can't I perform the swindler's Burlington Arcade trick of being set down at the Piccadilly end, and then bolting out at the other? No. There is no back-door, I recollect. I resign myself.

Determination.—I leave this to-morrow. Decidedly. Sorry not to be able to try more yachting. But this sort of thing on shore would worry me to death. To pine mentally, and grow stout physically, would be the worst state of existence possible (to me) to conceive.

I say, "Very well, then," cheerfully. "I won't go in. We'll ice."

More Thoughts as we walk.—Let me abstract myself. (I will to-morrow, bodily.) Abstract myself as I used to when my Aunt was playing and singing, and I wanted to read. I must take to my work again. I've done nothing for my Analytical History of Motion for weeks. . . . Good idea that of Americans making substantives do the duty of verbs. So expressive. . . . What a pretty girl she was . . . I wish she'd said that she "felt like soup." I should then, and we might have souped together.

"You don't speak to me," observes my companion, using as much of the eye-mitrailleuse as she can manage under the circumstances. "Why?"

No . . . I could have begun talking . . . but the "Why" prevents me. I shrug my shoulders. I tell her that one cannot really be always talking, and that one ought to think, and think deeply, sometimes.

She looks inquiringly at me for an instant, and then says, "Why?"

I swear I could dance with vexation. If it wouldn't have an absurd effect, and be utterly out of keeping with the gravity of the occasion, I would dance, and relieve my feelings. I "feel like dancing." I "feel like stamps."

I remonstrate with myself. This is childish. There is only one way of repressing this enfantillage, by over-weighting it with the (as it were) Johnsonian.

We enter the Confectioner's; I am preparing a weighty and severe speech for her. All for her benefit. The Ices. I shall now address her seriously.

READY FOR SOMETHING—WHAT?

“Y dear Miss Straithmere,” I commence, quietly and solemnly, “When you ask why is it necessary to think deeply sometimes, I can only reply,” —the slightest pause merely to collect a pailful of the heaviest three syllables, and crush her, like Tarpeia, under the golden words of Wisdom. She takes advantage of it, and says, “O, you’re angry with me . . . with poor little me!” Poor little me!—she really is half a head taller,—a whole head, taking in the appendage,—than I am. It does irritate me. I make a false step, and allow myself to deny the charge. I say, “Angry! No! I’m not angry,” which only means that I am not ragingly furious. She continues, “I’m sure you’re angry with me. Why?”

Why? Why! Why!!!!—

The Confectioner’s. I change the subject. I say gaily, quoting our American friend, “Now, let’s feel like ice.” Then I artfully lead up to the idea which struck me a short time since. I say, “You’ve made a conquest of the French Count.”

"Why?" A pause. "Please, tell me, why? Won't you?"

I attempt a parable, as a mode of explanation new to me, and not altogether unpoetical. I say, "You know how the snake charms the bird."

"No," she replies ingenuously. "Why does it?"

I can't descend from parable into mere natural history. I like a person to seize on a simile at once, and to see what you mean, if anything, rather better than you do yourself. Enter the ices. She persists, "Why do you call me a snake?"

I beg her pardon, I didn't.

Enter Robert, hurriedly. "Lady Wetherby thought it might be important, sir," he says, and hands me a telegram.

I open it—from Doddridge. For Doddridge to telegraph means something serious.

"Your Aunt wishes to see you. Some law business. Captain Budd has promised to write."

Law business? "I didn't know you were a barrister!" observes Miss Straithmere. "No?" I reply carelessly, as much as to intimate that that is her fault.

"You are glad to go?" says Miss Straithmere, looking up from her ice, and then looking down again immediately. Then she adds, "Why are you glad to go?"

[Real Answer. Because you go on saying, "why?"]

Sham Answer, for external application.—"No, I'm sorry to leave Torquay; I'm only glad because Law business means actual work to do—perhaps; and though My Health wouldn't stand being cooped up in Courts for long, yet an occasional case with a brief marked with a fifty, or a hundred, guineas, would be," (I put it pleasantly,) "a very nice thing."

We rise, and return quickly to Firkin Terrace.

Dress for Dinner—Thoughts while Dressing.—Perhaps a real chance at the Bar. After all, the question is whether hard work at the Bar wouldn't be better for My Health, with an occasional holiday, than any other course. "May it please your Lordship, Gentlemen of the Jury," I commence while washing my hands, and somehow having no case to continue upon, I seem to quote as following naturally, "the Scripture moveth us in sundry places" when it suddenly occurs to me that this is not what I meant.

Idea suggested by the lapsus linguæ, though.—Why not be a clergyman? There's health! Beautiful country. Happy Pastor with his simple flock. Goes about patting children's heads, and smiling on everybody. Everybody smiling in return, and touching hats, and curtsying. General serenity. Sits in his chair in the garden on a summer's evening, his wife (the beloved and good angel of the village) beside him. . . . Why not a young American wife? . . . or why not . . .

All loppiness gone off now. Sudden Inspiration! To write a Nautical Ballad. The Lop, or Gaily goes the ship. What rhymes to Lop? Shop, not ship. When the wind drops—then the—I have it.

"THE LOP:" A NAUTICAL BALLAD.

(To the air of the first chorus of "Le Meunier et ses Hommes.")

1st Verse.—WHEN the wind blows,
Then the ship goes,
Our hearts are all blithe and merry;
When the wind drops,
Then the ship "lops,"—
Can we laugh and sing hey down derry?

2nd Verse.—When a breeze blows,
Then the yacht goes
As easily as a wherry;

When the breeze drops,
Then the yacht lops,
And we call for a brandy-cherry.*

3rd Verse.—When the tide flows,
Then the yacht goes
As easily as a wherry ;
When the sea chops,
Then the yacht lops,
And we feel ill and queer—oh, very !

4th Verse.—When the wind blows,
Then the ship goes
If it likes to the Head of Berry ;†
But fearing “lops,”
I know who stops
At home ‡ and is happy very.

Excitement of probable legal career and proposed sudden departure has done me good. Dinner.

Last Post.—Letter from Budd. He says :—

“I met your Aunt. She explained to me that your Cousin, I think, she said, had bought some harness for a basket-chaise for her when he was in the Mediterranean, and that this has somehow been partly detained at Florence, and partly at Paris, from which place, it seems (or from Milan), it was originally stolen. Hence, there are several claimants. The French Government, besides having committed the enormity of purchasing a whole heap of something of the sort, says that this is part of it. That's one claim. The Emperor of Russia is somehow mixed up in it on account of the Imperial Arms being on the breast-plates. But it had been twice sold in England previously, and, I believe, pawned in Florence, though the man who did this has been traced to Norway. I don't quite understand it. But your Aunt said she'd paid for you, years ago, to be a barrister, and she didn't see why you shouldn't undertake the work. The Solicitor says it'll be worth ten guineas a day and all expenses paid, with refreshers of fifty. It entails going to Paris and Florence, and all sorts of places, examining the Frenchies and the P'others. So get up your 'parleyvoo,' and go in for the enormity of ten guineas a day, and send it to me to keep for you.

* Brandy-cherry, an excellent remedy against the mal-de-mer. Try it. If not found efficacious, the dose need not be repeated.

“HENRY CADUGGIN BUDD”

“P.S. You'll have to start to-morrow if the Solicitor decides upon giving you the brief; and, from what your Aunt says, I'm almost sure he will. You see it doesn't depend solely upon her, as she is only one of five claimants in England alone. Your Cousin seems to have made a nice mess of it. Samuel from the Baths sends his love, and photograph. Adoo !

“P.P.S. I was just sealing this up when your Aunt's maid came in. You are to wait a day.”

It is arranged that I stop to-morrow. Lady Wetherby says, cheerfully, that she's made out a little plan for our to-morrow.

Night.—In my room. Early. Think I am very much better. Decidedly tired, but comparatively well. Hope it will last. If this case of my Aunt's comes off, it would open a new career to me. Read Budd's letter again. He doesn't put it quite clearly.

How shall I manage if I have to go abroad and examine witnesses in France, Spain, and Italy; i.e. in French, Spanish, and Italian? Suppose I shall travel with an Interpreter. Good thing for My Health. Must get up the Law on Harness. . . . After all, yachting is a lazy life, and tends to stoutness. . . . I should only be unhealthy, and, perhaps, unwieldy, if I continued yachting. . . . To bed . . .

Morning.—Robert arranges my things for my getting up. That is, he turns everything inside out. Can't understand why. ["Why" reminds me of Miss Straithmere. "If she wasn't so" . . . (here I pull on my boots) . . . "I think I might" . . . (braces) . . . "but she is really so" . . . (buttoning collar, head well up). . . . What a lot of force it requires to button a collar. Painful too. Agonising expression; spasmodic twist of the mouth.

The Tortures of Dressing.—I know a man who, so to speak, is spikes and mechanism all over. Buckles with sharp points to his waistcoat and trousers. Buckles with sharper points on his shoes. His tie an ingenious mechanical contrivance made of silk, iron, and a strong hand pulley. When hoisted, as it were, it forms a sailor's knot. His studs cut his fingers and his shirt front, and make him positively dance with pain when dressing in a hurry for dinner. The great invention of the age would be a buttonless costume entire.

Flash.—Remember a weird German story called The Shadowless Man. Adapt and adopt title, The Buttonless Man. Companion to the former volume that occurred to me about the Dinnerless Man.

Down to Breakfast.—Fine day. Wetherby says, capital day for Trawling. I do not reply. "Silence," as some advertisements say, "to be considered a respectful negative." No one es to the notion of trawling. The Retainers are sent for as usual. Bunter is told to be in readiness with the Launch. Hasid, "Yes, sir," and disappeared. The Boy in Tops has been ordered to bring round the ponies immediately. Robert has been ordered, in a general way, to be ready for anything that may happen. Ranger, the butler, has been sent to get everything that Wetherby may have forgotten. The Captain is under command to be within hail at a moment's notice, and if he doesn't go out by twelve, he is to spend the rest of his day in superintending somebody who has to do something, with putty, on the deck. Jim is told off to assist in packing some boxes, and bringing 'em down-stairs; and little Cripp is sent to fetch a pair with a good horse, and Bill and Harry (from yacht) are summoned.

"Got the tackle?" asks Wetherby.

Bill looks at Harry, and Harry at him back again. Then Bill replies that he has.

"Hey? what?" asks Wetherby.

Bill, assisted by Harry, repeats that the tackle is ready.

"Then," after some consideration, Wetherby says, quickly, "put it on the Launch." Exeunt Bill and Harry.

Thoughts.—What are we going to do? Sail in the yacht? or in a fly? fish in the Launch? go about in the pony-rig?

It is evident we are ready for anything.

HE result of all Wetherby's arrangements is, that the ladies go by train to Dartmouth.

Wetherby asks me, if I'll accompany him in the Steam Launch.

Never having been in a Steam Launch, I say, "Yes." I don't know why, but up to this minute I had supposed that a Launch was something like a magnificent pleasure barge, only sea-going, instead of for river.

The yacht-boat is in waiting at the stairs.

We are rowed away from the large vessels, and towards an enormous buoy. A pantomimic buoy. We pass the buoy, and I see nothing like a Launch before us. There's a small boat in the distance. Coming nearer I perceive Bunter in it. He is apparently sitting in the boat, with a steam-engine, all to himself. I remember having seen, somewhere, the title of a play which struck me very much; it was "The Lonely Man of the Ocean." At this minute, evidently Bunter.

Alongside the Launch.—This is the Launch. The steam-engine works a screw, and the screw works the boat, underneath, how.

The Launch is like nothing that I had imagined.

It is a sort of steam-gondola. On the whole, an adaptation, for sea purposes, of the covered cart, the washing-tub, the life-boat, and a floating coal-cellar. The neatness, brightness, and miniature size of the machinery, remind me of the show-models in the Polytechnic.

Now I know Bunter's department. Of this vessel he is Captain and Crew.

We go along at a great pace. "We" means Wetherby, steer-boat, and myself in the stern, and Bunter astride the centre seat, looking up the fire, and doing something with a tap, or a screw, every other minute.

The action of the machinery makes me feel a sort of sharp, rattling, thudding motion internally, as if one's heart was working overtime. The Launch grunts and groans, like an old gentleman troubled with an asthmatic cold, when in anything like rough water," or what Bunter calls a "bit of a sea on."

Bunter has his way of managing the Launch. Wetherby has his, which is not, it appears, though it ought to be, Bunter's; Bunter's ought to be his. At all events, I wish they'd exchange.

Wetherby.—Afraid I've chosen wrongly in not going by train. I don't feel that there'll be any repetition of the loup, but nervousness might upset me to-day.

Going in, as it were, an open boat alone, with a fierce mode, steam-engine, and at the mercy of two men, differing essentially in opinion as to how the infernal machine is to be worked, is, certainly calculated to make one uncommonly nervous.

Wetherby suddenly exclaims, "Unscrew the nut!" or some mechanical term.

Bunter returns, with a sulky humour in his Eye, that "The nut is all right."

Wetherby insists that it is nothing of the sort. Turning to me, he informs me, that, if the nut is not unscrewed, we might be all blown up in a second.

[Flash.—Situation sensational—Dramatic. Suppose myself a prisoner-of-war being taken off by two guards to a fortress. The two guards disagree as to the management of the Launch. One says, "Turn the nut!" the other insists upon doing something to the screw. Consequence: Explosion. Two guards blown to bits. Prisoner saved—picked up by a slaver—sold—falls in love with his master's daughter. Romance. Quite Victor-Hugoish.

Brilliant Flash.—Write it.]

To this Bunter replies, that "There's no danger." Still I do wish that he'd mind what Wetherby says, and unscrew the nut. At last he does so. A whistle of steam escapes. Wetherby says, "There!" and then adds, sotto voce, to me, as Bunter goes for'ard for coal, "He won't do what he's told at once—it's deuced annoying." I admit that it is confoundedly annoying. Because, considering that the result of his not doing what he's told at once, would be simply fatal, his disobedience is, I feel, rather more than merely "annoying." It's wicked. It's like going about with a Nautical Guy Fawkes, ready to blow the Government and himself up at any minute.

Wetherby, immediately after this, exclaims, in a sharp, commanding tone that startles any qualmishness out of me, "Bunter, put the valve up!" No, Bunter won't. I feel inclined to say, "Do, Bunter, there's a good soul, do put the valve up." Bunter replies, that "If it's put up, we shan't go half speed." Wetherby ys, "Yes, we shall, if he keeps the [something or other] screwed." Bunter's Eye smiles, as if saying, "Well, have it our own way," and complies. Great relief. At least, as a spite: not blown up yet.

"Bunter!" exclaims Wetherby (his style of starting a question really frightening, and you can't help listening to it with intense interest; because here you are out at sea, floating about with a steam-engine, which, "if not managed properly," he says, may explode any moment—there, he adds, is the danger"), "Bunter!" he exclaims, hurriedly, and as if he himself was frightened to death, "you've not got any water in." Another pond, and if the water is not in, we shall—Heavens! why doesn't Bunter do it at once?

Bunter makes no reply. Most irritating. There he sits, with a sort of leer on his countenance, blinking at the mine.

Hey! what?" asks Wetherby, quickly, while I observe every movement anxiously; for our lives (as far as I see) depend upon Bunter's having water in.

Bunter growls that "It doesn't want it yet."

Wetherby says, "Yes, it does." Well, why can't Bunter look to see if Wetherby or he is right?

Slowly Bunter does open the boiler (or some secret recess) and looks in. Water is wanted. Bunter admits it now, but sticks to that it wasn't when Wetherby first spoke. Respired again. Blown up yet. Where is the land?

Now one sees exactly how accidents happen. But why should we differ because they have a difference of opinion on the management of the steamer?

Don't do that!" almost screams out Wetherby.

In my word, I feel inclined to throw myself on Bunter, and pitch him overboard, if possible. He is simply playing with our lives.

Bunter looks up in the act of putting some little brass regulator (Heaven knows what !) two pegs lower than it was.

"Must do that," he replies, sulkily, but always with a strong sense of the humour of the situation in his right Eye. He must possess a very fine appreciation of grim humour.

"Not a bit of it," returns Wetherby, hurriedly, and in evident trepidation. "It will blow the chimney off, if you lower it. Keep it up, and fix the knob."

(Do, Bunter, do! Don't be an idiot, and play with steam !)

He obeys orders slowly. Third respite. We go on right enough for five minutes more.

Suddenly something occurs to Wetherby. "Bunter !" he almost screams, "you haven't got the safety-pipe eased !"

"It's all right, Sir," says Bunter.

"Hey! All right? No, it isn't," returns Wetherby, excitedly. "If we get it a bit rough round the point, it'll burst, and blow the bottom of the Launch right out."

Really, it occurs to me what a fool Bunter is to come out without having seen to the safety-pipe. And what a name, "the Safety-pipe?" The Unsafety-pipe. He does something to it, which I suppose saves us, as Wetherby nods at me with the air of a man who feels that he has just given the right order at the right time, but doesn't wish to boast of it. I return Wetherby's nod. My nod implies a vote of entire confidence in Wetherby, and none whatever in Bunter and all his works—I mean his steam-mechanism. However, we are going on quietly now. Respited once more. Where is the land? We proceed, suspiciously. That is, Bunter is watching the engine, Wetherby is watching Bunter and the engine, and I'm watching Wetherby, unter, and the engine, with an intensity of interest almost painful.

I ask how long we shall be before getting to Dartmouth. Bunter replies, "Not long." This question of mine seems to arouse Wetherby to a sense of (apparently) some new danger.

"Have you got the donkey working?" he asks, frowning.

Bunter replies, doggedly, that "The donkey ain't not much use."

"Not much use!" exclaims Wetherby, "why that's what we want. That's what I got it for."

This, he explains to me, is a donkey-engine. I don't exactly know, from what he says, whether we shall blow up with, or without it; but what I do ascertain is, that, on board the Launch, we are in a state of perpetual and uncommon danger, owing to the apparently complicated arrangement of screws, nuts, valves, and donkey-engine, and Bunter into the bargain. The only variety in the sort of danger. In one case we may be blown up, in the other (namely, the bottom of the Launch coming out) we shall be blown down.

Rocks Ahead.—"Must go outside these," says Wetherby.

"Go inside, Sir," replies Bunter, pointing out a narrow strait between two of the largest rocks. Crisis.

"You haven't got any water in the boiler!" says Wetherby, his eye fixed on the course right ahead.

Bunter wags his head, as much as to convey that "he knows more than that," implying thereby that he has got water in the boiler. I wish he'd look. He can't know. Wetherby concedes, quickly, "Ease her a bit!" Then, seeing him touching the brass knob, he exclaims, "Don't do that!!" Bunter shrugs up, as if he was hurt at this tone. Better he should be hurt in his feelings, than that we should be blown up, or blown

We are approaching the strait. I don't think the sea does agree with me. When once on shore, I shan't try it again. We are nearing the rocks. It looks rough. The Launch is plunging and groaning. Wetherby is, I think, agitated. He says, he can't see clearly whether that's a rock sticking up just out of the water right before us, or not.

We shall soon know.

N—no; off the rocks. Clear.

I feel now that it has been a "near thing."

Dartmouth in view. Lovely. Most picturesque.

"Quite," I say to Wetherby, "like the entrance ome foreign town!" Pause. No reply from Wetherby, who one eye for what Bunter's doing (which is to me apparently ing), and another for the steering. I ask Wetherby if he sn't think this like the entrance to a foreign—efore I can finish my question he is down on Bunter in an ted and hurried tone. "You haven't got any water in the er!"

The result of this negligence on the part of Bunter is, Wetherby already said, explosion. And in sight of land, too!

Bunter returns, quietly, "Ain't there, 'Sir?" His air of repose inspires me with no sort of confidence. He is dozing, with a humorous smile in his half-open eyes, on a volcano.

Presence of mind on my part. To say calmly, "Hadn't you better look and see if there's any water, Bunter?"

He lifts up the top of something, and peeps in, as he would do into a saucepan when an egg was being boiled. He makes no remark, but quits his seat phlegmatically, and puts water into the boiler.

Wetherby looks at me and winks, as much as to say, "You see what an obstinate fellow he is. I knew I was right; and, if I hadn't spoken in time, 'pop,' to speak lightly, 'would have gone our weasel,' or, rather, our wessel."

Wetherby being now able to attend, it occurs to me that I will observe, for the third time, that the approach to Dartmouth by sea is quite Continental.

Wetherby replies shortly, that he doesn't see anything Continental about it.

On reconsidering my remark, I am inclined to agree with him. I've approached several places abroad from the sea: viz., Antwerp, Boulogne, Dieppe, Havre, Calais, Ostend, and Dartmouth isn't a bit like any of these. "Yet there's a touch of Rhine scenery in it," I say. Wetherby replies, "Eh! What?" and is keeping a sharp look-out. On reconsideration there is not a touch of Rhine scenery about it.

The Houses of Dartmouth on either side of the river seem to me as if they had all been coming down the slopes to bathe, but had stopped short, at various distances from the brink, to deliberate on the next step.

Safe at the landing-place at last.

We get out. Bunter retires to some moorings where he may put coal on, or leave water out, or unscrew a nut, or play with the donkey-engine, or do, in fact, just what he pleases, as he is one.

Lady Wetherby and Miss Straithmere are on the quay.

Two gentlemen are talking to them. One is tall and thin, with a blonde moustache and cavalry whiskers. He is dressed in a sort of shooting costume. I set him down at once as Captain Somebody, of the Something Hussars.

The other is a little round tubby man, with a small head.

Flash of Simile.—Like a turtle standing upright.

Wetherby had expected them, it appears, but had been uncertain, or perhaps the excitement of the Launch had put them out of his head. There are also two lads with the party, of about sixteen and twelve years of age. Behind them is the pony-carriage, and a dog-cart and small groom, new to me. It is comparatively early in the morning, and we have the whole day before us for our excursion. On the whole, glad it's inland, and not the Channel.

Wetherby says, "Ah! there's Vicomte Mellong" (or some French name, something like that).

I wonder which is the Vicomte. Little Tubby or the Hussar. The Hussar is so decidedly English, that it must be Tubby, who is in a sort of yachting costume.

Sudden Flash (while walking up towards them).—Get up and speak to the French for the Vicomte. Take care to have something to say to him. Excellent thing to practise a foreign language on every opportunity. Capital thing, too, to have a Vicomte to talk to, because it makes you au fait at how to put a thing gracefully in French. Wonder if Wetherby is also practising sentences.

Useful Flash of Thought (more presence of mind).—One great advantage in conversation with a foreigner, when you're not quite easy (to put it pleasantly) in the language, is to take the initiative yourself. In a street fight, the First Blow decides the battle. The question, Who's to give it? is the one you must always decide in your own favour, and, evidently, before it occurs to the other fellow, your opponent. The rule is simply this: you tread on some one's toes, or insult him accidentally; he turns upon you threateningly. Knock him down. No indecision: knock him down. Don't say, "If you do that again, I'll, &c." A cabman growls, "Why, I'd punch your 'ed for fourpence!" Knock him down, out of hand. And so on. Same in conversation in a foreign language—say, as in this case, in French. Don't wait for the distinguished alien to open upon you with the hitherto masked battery of a long rattling sentence, which will probably blow you into syllables, but fire upon him, with a sentence to which the answer, if it requires one, can be anticipated. Then you work easily.

Flash. We are just upon them, and I haven't arranged a single phrase: Stop for one second to tie my shoe. Gain time. What shall I say? How shall I put it? Let me see. "Est-ce que Monsieur le Vicomte aime yachting?" On this might follow, "M. le Vicomte, je suis enchanté de faire votre connaissance," and then come out with the question about yachting.

If the worst comes to the worst, I can adapt commonplaces thus: "Il fait beau temps pour yachting, n'est-ce pas?"

Also, "Est-ce que vous êtes long-temps en Angleterre?"

Mem. (while tying my shoe.) Must take care not to make long-temps sound exactly like "Long Tom." Also mind my "u"s and "r"s.

Also, "Est-ce que" (always begin with "est-ce que" whenever you possibly can) "M. le Vicomte aime la campagne plus que la vie en ville?"

Once more. "Je suis enchanté d'apprendre que M. le Vicomte viendra avec nous pour faire un pic-nic."

And, if he can't come. "Ah M. le Vicomte, que je suis désolé de vous ne pouvez pas aller avec nous pour faire un pic-nic."

Shoe-tie settled. I am prepared. Wetherby calls. They are ready to start. I am introduced to the little man first. I am prepared with "Je suis enchanté," &c. He is merely Mr. Durley, Lieutenant Durley, of some ship, somewhere. The other is the Vicomte. His name does sound like Mellong. Wonder how it is spelt. I bow politely, most politely. Always like to impress on foreigners that we are neither bears, nor shopkeepers. In second thought, shopkeepers do bow most politely. In fact, shopkeepers are always bowing.] Now to commence, "Je suis enchanté." . . .

Whether the Vicomte hears this, or not, I don't know; but while just returning my salute, he says to Wetherby, in the finest possible English, "We're all here, now; how shall we divide the party?"

Not a bit of a Frenchman about him: not in dress, manner, speech, or anything.

The two boys (they are Lady Wetherby's, whom Wetherby mentioned to me when I first arrived) beg to go on the Vicomte's dog-cart (it's his dog-cart, too, and his groom; all as English as possible), when he makes himself responsible for their safety.

Oh, I should like to go on the dog-cart," exclaims Miss Wuthmere, and gives the Vicomte "one" in his eyes with hers. The Vicomte offers to take her. "I may go, mayn't I?" she asks, in a playfully entreating manner, of Lady Wetherby: then she adds, "I won't fall off." Then, turning to me, "You will hold me on, won't you?"

I reply, that this arrangement is impossible, as the dog-cart won't hold the Vicomte, her, me, two boys, and a groom. Where-upon she pouts, and says to me (of course always to me, and before the tubby Lieutenant and the Vicomte), "You don't want to come. Why?"

Why? Upon my——

Lady Wetherby, smiling good-humouredly, thinks that Janie had better go with her, one of her boys with M. Mellong, the other with Wetherby, and the tubby Lieutenant and myself in the two-horse fly with Bunter on the box beside the coachman.

Bunter, Wetherby says, had better come, in case of accidents. Why Bunter is chosen as being mixed up with accidents (except on account of his conduct on board the Launch), I don't know.

"You see," explains Lady Wetherby, "M. Mellong is taking our hampers, so that it would not be fair to overload his trap. And it's a long day for the ponies; so I thought that" (with a pleasant smile) "as the fly had two strong horses, the heaviest load had better go in it."

Meditations after this, while in the Fly.—The heaviest load means Tubby, Bunter, and me. This remark saddens me.

Notes for a Letter to my Doctor.—I begin to foresee my fate. Coming events forecast their shadows. The coming event, for me, is stoutness—stoutness of a peculiar kind. I used to have fat days, now I have fat hours and fat minutes. I have had change of air, quiet, rest, walks, Turkish Baths, sea-breezes, sea-sickness, yachting, driving. Still I don't see any permanent change for the better.

Sometimes in the morning I observe with satisfaction that I can buckle my waistband tight, and like it. I am light, airy, can walk along with an elastic step. I have an excellent appetite. I partake of a moderate lunch. Immediately, I feel myself overburdened. I can no more move without puffing, than steam-engine. A dulness comes over me. Whatever I have taken, I seem to have soused myself in (so to express myself, my dear Doctor), and absorbed it, like a sponge, specially if it has been gravy. After that meal I am all gravy.

Do you know, my dear Doctor, what it is to tumble into ten feet of sea-water, and come up again with it in your nose, ears, and mouth? Imagine the same, only in gravy. Whatever I take seems to cling to me. My dear Doctor, what does all this mean? Sneezing is a relief to me, and my sneezes are painful to beholders and agonising to myself. Sometimes they almost strangle me, and my nose goes off, after a desperate struggle, like the report of a pistol. After a sneeze, I detect myself wheezing; wheezing, dear Doctor, absolutely that. Do send me your advice. My own idea is exercise, but now? . . . We are going up a hill.

EAR Miss Straithmere, sitting near, asks, "Why don't you talk?" Then, seeing me writing my notes, "Are you writing something nice about me? Do let me see it—won't you?" I tell her that it's nothing for her to see. She replies, "Why? Why mayn't I see it?" Then suddenly. "O, Lady Wetherby, do look what beautiful" ("beau" is a low note, "ti" is one note higher, and "full" is raised a little, but dropped immediately) "flowers. Aren't they too lovely? O!" ecstatically, "I should like to have some of those!" with a look at me.

Flash of Intelligence.—She wants me to get out, rush up the bank, five feet at least, almost perpendicular, a wall of brambles and prickles, and make a dash at these idiotic flowers. I won't take the hint. Tubby may. I won't. The Fly is now walking up a hill. She cries out suddenly, "O! what lovely flowers! O! I must have some." I can only see a few daisies running o seed, a cluster of bright yellow, coarse-looking flowers, and some few very common ferns. A farthing for the lot would be dear.

Lieutenant Durley smiles. She has impressed him. He is young, and fat.

Note.—There is some consolation to me in seeing him. He's Lieutenant: a sailor. Therefore, he must have to get up ropes, and be engaged on "active service." How can he, being so fat? Yet if he can, I can. On inspection, I should describe him as—as—ha! A Flash (of description). Pulpy. Yes, I could certainly call him more "pulpy" than fat. The latter implies weight and a certain amount of solidity: the other doesn't.

Miss Straithmere begs the coachman to stop. She will jump out, climb the banks, and get them herself. The Lieutenant in silent admiration. Lady Wetherby thinks that perhaps it would be as well if we walked going up the hill. Bunter is ready down. So is the driver. We all descend except Lady Wetherby, who regards us placidly, as much as to say, "I hope I'm enjoying yourselves; I am."

Vote for Doctor.—Now I notice my wheeziness. Up a hill. Miss Straithmere flops down by the roadside, and begins tearing handfuls of flowers; then she sees some up above, and presses me appealingly, "Won't you get those for me? Only a little flower? Why won't you?"

Real Answer.—Because I'm wheezy, and can't scramble. Answer for all practical purposes, "I don't think they're worth going."

But," she says, appealingly. "If I want them. Won't you?"

se. "Why won't you?"

Lieutenant Durley has craftily stopped behind. He comes up now radiant with a whole handful of flowers for her. "Oh, how beautiful. Oh, thank you so much! Oh, I must wear this in my hair!" Then she runs after the carriage, and cries out to Lady Wetherby, with an arch look over her shoulder at me, "Isn't it kind of Lieutenant Durley? Look—aren't these beautiful? Aren't they too lovely! Do have some, Lady Wetherby, won't you? Oh, do!"

Lady Wetherby, who has seen daisies, ferns, and buttercups before in her life (I am bitter, I feel it, over this egregious folly; and then for Mr. Durley, a Lieutenant in the Navy, to be taken in . . . bah!), selects two, smiling cheerfully, as if taking them is part of some game.

"You'll have one?" she says to me. The Lieutenant looks glum. I decline to receive it.

"Not if I give you one?" shot at me from under her eyelashes. Almost at the same time, she, somehow, manages to fire another barrel at the Lieutenant, who receives his wound gratefully.

Flash of Idea.—Her eyes are Straithmere revolvers. Always loaded—eye-lashes, hair triggers.

No answer. "Why—why won't you?"

"Because," pettishly—I feel it's pettish, but I can't help it, specially going up hill—"I can't put it in my button-hole. Give it," I suggest, somewhat maliciously, "to Lieutenant Durley."

I mean by this, "Farewell for ever, Coquette. Go to your Durley, or to whomsoever you like to victimise."

Bunter comes up, and offers her flowers, shyly. His Eye says, "Here's a lark! I see through it, you know! Fancy me a hofferin' flowers to a gal. Luncheon's comin'! Hooray for Wetherby!"

She thanks him enthusiastically. Then we re-seat ourselves in our vehicle. We are the last of the party on the road. More flowers. More ejaculations of delight. Lieutenant Durley gets down, and scales a hedge to procure a thing like convolvulus. "O, thank you!" she cries, thanking him, but hooting a glance at me, as much as to say, "See what some people will do for me." Then looking up at the other bank, she cries to me, "O, do get me that, won't you? Or help me up, and I'll get it? May I, Lady Wetherby?" Lady Wetherby plies, that if the flower is necessary to her existence, that she had better let me get it for her. Let me! I'd never offered.

"If you'll only get that one," says Miss Straithmere, leaning well forward at me, "I'll promise I'll never ask you again."

Lady Wetherby smiles. I fancy, from her hint just now, she beginning to think me disagreeable. Perhaps she is coming me with Durley, who jumps down and jumps up, and asks flowers for anybody. She doesn't know how I am being tired by the state of my health and Miss Janie's enfantillage. But I see an opportunity now to show how obliging my real ure is.

"Never?" I inquire.

"Never!" she answers.

"A bargain. I'll do it. It's only a dandelion, I know, and the work is, perhaps, not so difficult as it looks. It looks a wall of blackberry bushes, brambles, and wild somethings which catch hold of your clothes and stop you while other wild somethings catch you.

I have a great mind to seize the opportunity, and say, "Look here, promise me you'll never say 'Why' again, and I'll get you anything you want for you."

I get down. The middle of the hill. Durley is on the other side of the carriage. Bunter is on a-head. I am alone.

I make a dash at the bank. I stop short of it, and consider. Hope no one saw me make this abortive dash.

I look at the bank, to see where's the best place to begin climbing. Confound her, what nonsense this is. If it hadn't been for Lady Wetherby I wouldn't have got down. No, I'd have said, "If you want 'em, get 'em yourself."

I do not see how to get up this bank. Five feet high—it's ten feet, if an inch. And not meant to be climbed up. Wish I'd got gloves with me. I have. In my pocket. Just the pair. Old,

I try to beat down some brambles with my feet, then by laying hold of others with my hands I shall gradually arrive at the stupid idiot of a wild flower.

Flash.—Can't do it in cold blood. Do it in hot. I mean, take a run from the other side of the road, and crash into it. The carriage has reached the top of the hill, and they are waiting for me. Everybody is looking. A country boy with a pudding face, and a mouth large enough to swallow his own head stands to gawk at me. One minute. I make my run, and jump at the bank: on it, exactly where I was before, without the slightest impetus.

Some prickly things [exactly as I had expected] catch hold of my coat affectionately. I try to pull away from them. I see something just beyond me, a little higher up, which apparently has no thorns. That might assist me. I grasp it. Ah!!

It startles me so (being studded with strong thorns, like hard nails, point outwards) that I lose my balance. Staggering downwards, somehow I am slightly stopped by a family of brambles, which are so unwilling to part with me (as if they hadn't seen me for years), that jumping violently on to my feet into the road (an inspiration which saves me from falling on my head), I bring most of the members of the bramble family with me. The idiot plough-boy grins, and says something which sounds like "Yer garnt gurr-gurr." I ask him "What?" sharply, and he replies, "Yer garnt gurr-gurr," much the same as before. I fancy he is giving me advice.

Flash of Ingenuity.—To return to the carriage and say I would have got the flower, but the boy told me I was trespassing. Perhaps he is saying that.

My coat is quite roughed by thorns. Threads out, all over it. I stop to pick sharp points out of my trousers, and find that my gloves have not been much protection.

Bunter comes down the hill from the carriage, and says, "Lady Wetherby's compliments, Sir, and would you mind coming on as quickly as possible, as they can't stop any longer."

No, I don't try any more wild-flower hunting again for Miss Straithmere. To-day's Pic-nic is the last of her, for me, and then—Ah! Kranton Castle in view, where we're going to pic-nic.

RANTON Castle.—A magnificent ruin. About ten minutes' walk from this is the celebrated Fishing Lake. Bunter now appears with three sorts of rods, and several kinds of lines. The boy, too, with nets. Wetherby says, eagerly, "We'll go down to the Lake first, and then come back to the Castle."

We are to catch something tremendous in the way of fish, and to return triumphant. Is Bunter sure that he's got the reel all right? and the line No. 2? and the double-bait?

Bunter's Eye winks in reply, as much as to say, "Do you think this 'ere's the fust time as I've been out fresh-water fishin'? I've got 'em all right. We'll catch 'em, and eat 'em. Hooray for Wetherby!"

A melancholy looking place, the Lake. The greater part being taken up by reeds and rushes.

Lady Wetherby and Miss Straithmere walk down with us. That is, Lady Wetherby walks, and Miss Straithmere alternates between a slide, a skip, and a pounce. The slide takes her along with a sort of skating action. As she does this, she seems to be looking round archly at Lieutenant Durley and myself, and saying, "Am I not swan-like? am I not a sylph? Isn't it what you naughty, naughty boys call 'fetching,' to see me sail before you like this? Don't you feel like following me Anywhere? Can you not catch a twinkle of a provoking pair of boots? Can you? ! fie! Don't I know how to manage a parasol, so that from under its shelter I can fire my eye-revolvers with killing effect? I'm aware that you're observing my glove too, my right-hand one, that's nipping the parasol-handle . . . doesn't it look as if I fitted the plumpiest, softest, firmest hand in the world, not too small, not too large? . . . O, of course, I'm not saying this, of course I'm not thinking this. O no, I'm only a gay, thoughtless, skittish young thing (I've been so some time, perhaps) looking about by the side of my chaperon, Lady Wetherby."

don't think these are my friend Tubby's ideas. By "Tubby" I mean Lieutenant Durley. He seems to be lost in genuine admiration of Miss Janie. She has insisted upon coming out along with us, and she has caught the largest and the fattest of them. Tubby's hooked. No snake, charmed by the charmer's gaze, ever looked half so stupid as Tubby does now. He is looking about, mesmerised.

Flash of Thought as we Walk by the Lake.—When I first saw the charmer, was I like this? Did I suddenly appear, to obnoxious folks, as if my faculties had been suddenly dulled? In that case, did I wear the same stupid, heavy look as now disfigures (or extinguishes) Tubby the Fascinated? If so . . . I looked like this . . . I'll never be caught again! This I swear to myself, mentally, in the presence of two pigs foraging, an old hen excited about her adopted ducklings, and a small dog, by the side of the Lake, standing meditatively alone, our party being several yards ahead of me.

Wetherby "Hi ! hi !'s" to me. I come up with the party. The rods and nets are all ready. There is no boat, and no one of whom to inquire about one.

The Boy spies a man in the distance. Boy sent on to fetch him. Wetherby and Bunter commence arranging tackle. They've got enough, apparently, to catch all the fish in several lakes, with hooks nearly as big as those used in butchers' shops, where they look as if they'd been baited, fresh that morning, to take any strong sharks that might be about the streets.

"What are you going to catch?" I ask.

"Hey ! what ?" asks Wetherby. When, in reply to a repetition of my question, he says, "Pike."

I ask of anybody who likes to answer me, "Are pike good to eat ?"

I receive no answer except from Bunter's Eye, which, being towards me in profile, says, with the air of a gourmet, "O, ain't they, just ! Wetherby won't eat 'em ! I will. Baked and stuffed ! Hooray for Wetherby !"

It is a lovely mid-day, autumnally hot. There are no other signs of inhabiting life about the Lake than a few poor cottages, to which, probably, the old hen, ducklings, dog, and foraging pigs belong. They are, none of them, frightened of us ; but, on the contrary, seem inclined towards friendliness. The old hen runs along the edge of the shelving bank, and vainly endeavours to recall the venturesome ducklings, who, in their native element, won't listen to her querulous scoldings for a moment.

Miss Straithmere, having been silent—a rare thing with her—for at least ten minutes, now gives vent to her pent-up enthusiasm. Durley watching. I watching Tubby, with malicious satisfaction.

“O, look!” she exclaims, “did you ever see such beautiful ducks? O, Mr. Durley, aren’t they lovely?”

She flops down, as if to catch one (the playful child of nature!) but they are not to be taken in, and the hen puts herself, instinctively, on the defensive. Durley in admiration.

A Study of Durley.—Is he thinking of giving up the sea, retiring on half-pay, and living in a little cottage by a lake, with a fair-haired, child-like wife, who loves the quiet of the country, and its simple pleasures? Does he see, in his mind’s eye, (if at this moment Tubby has an eye open in his mind), a rustic porch, early morning, a Janie coming home with a fresh-killed duckling for breakfast, while he puts his nose over the top of the snow-white window-blind up-stairs, and says, “I’ll be down directly, dear; I’m just finishing my shaving.” Does he see this in a Flash? Or does he see nothing—in the present or in the future—except her?

“They won’t come!” she cries out, plaintively, poutingly, and still on the ground, like Queen Constance in King John, or a fancy pen-wiper in bright colours. “Why won’t they come?” she asks me.

I reply that I really don’t know why they won’t come.

“Don’t you?” she returns, looking up at me with intensity from under her parasol, the fringe of which cuts off Durley’s legs by the knees, and makes a vignette of them. “Don’t you know?” she continues, with a tinge of sadness in her voice, and then a slight pause, as if for a hushed sigh, before she asks me, “Why don’t you know?” I shrug my shoulders. Her tone is softer, more touching, more beseechingly tender, as she continues, "Why won't you tell me? Why? . . . Won't you!" I am beginning to pity Durley, when, without a quarter of a bar's rest, she has taken up, as it were, a tune in another key, jumping from rallentando to adagio with the skill of Neruda, the female fiddle-player.

Flash.—Happy simile. She is mistress of her instrument. But Durley may dance to her tunes, not I. "My dancing days, Miss Straithmere" (I say to myself all in the flash), "as far as you're concerned, are over."

"O!" she bursts out, "did you ever see such beautiful scenery?"

Durley looks about him, and murmurs something vaguely. The picturesque is evidently not his strong point.

"O, Lady Wetherby!" she exclaims. "How delightful! I could live here for ever!!" Lady Wetherby smiles—I smile. A cherub-like smile illuminates Tubby's face.

Flash.—If he only had wings instead of shirt-collars, he'd make his fortune by sitting to sculptors for "any ornaments for your tombstones." . . . He looks out towards the distant hills beyond the far side of the Lake, and says, "Yes, it's a niceish sort of place."

"Isn't it?" Miss Straithmere goes on. "O look at the reeds! and the rushes! and, O, I'm sure, I saw a fish jump up. O, Mr. Durley, was it a fish?—a large fish! O, I should be so frightened if it was a very large fish!" and she starts up, on to her feet.

I have no doubt that Durley is feeling in his heart that he would dare all the fish in the Lake for her, but she doesn't give him time (Tubby is a little slow) to formulate his ideas on the subject, as she sees something yellow about a foot or so from shore. "O, a lily!" she cries. "I'm sure it's a lily! O, Mr. Durley, will you get it for me?"

"My dear Janie," says Lady Wetherby, laughingly, "Mr. Durley can't go in there without getting wet."

"O, you wouldn't get wet? Would you?" she says, inquiringly, turning to the Lieutenant, who, I am sure, is debating whether it's delicate to take off his boots and stockings before ladies or not.

"Would you? Why would you get wet? Why? tell me?"

"I'll fetch it for you," says the Lieutenant, sturdily, defying his boots.

She restrains him. "No," she murmurs, "don't get wet for me. I can reach it with my parasol, if you'll hold my hand."

Wetherby, who has been seated for the last quarter of an hour with a rod in his hand, and the line in the water, fishing for anything, so as not to lose time, here requests Miss Janie, rather grumpily, not to disturb the water.

"Why?" she asks.

"Can't fish, if you do," returns Wetherby.

"Why can't you fish?" she asks. No answer.

At this moment—I have also seated myself, and have commenced doing nothing with a line in the Lake—the hen perches quietly on my rod.

"O, isn't that clever?" exclaims Miss Janie. Did you ever see anything so clever?"

Durley is evidently turning the matter over in his mind, to find out if, for the sake of conversation, he can produce an instance of parallel talent on the part of a hen. He strokes his chin and meditates. Bunter offers him a rod.

"O do fish!" cries his enslaver, as if he'd positively refused.

He takes the rod. He is dreaming, I see he is—he sees a happy rustic cottage, himself supplying the second course, from the Lake, for the evening meal, and his playful wife welcoming the tired fisherman at the door. That's his dream. He can't speak. Tubby's hooked.

Rough-looking Man comes up, followed by the Boy.

"We want a boat," says Wetherby.

"Ain't none," replies the Man.

"No boat?"

"No."

"Hum!" says Wetherby, evidently meditating bribery and corruption. "There's lots of pike here, I suppose. Eh?"

"A goodish few. In the middle and thereabouts. Sees 'em playing like children. But you can't catch 'em."

"Can't?" exclaims Wetherby, looking at his preparations.

"Why?" asks Miss Straithmere, levelling her glance at the poor Fisherman, to catch him.

"Acos no fishin' ain't allowed 'ere now. It's all preserved."

"But my card——" suggests Wetherby.

"Couldn't let you do it, sir. Much as my place's worth." Then, as if he felt he'd been too stern, he adds, "You can fish from the bank as much as you like."

"But I can't catch anything there," says Wetherby, grumpily.

"No," returns the Fisherman; "except dace and perch."

Bunter commences packing up the tackle. The Fisherman begins to be communicative. He points in the direction of the rushes and reeds.

"There's Couttses there; they comes from and to the bank, but they're mostly there. All preserved."

I say, "O, indeed!" Our party is going on, and the Man has singled me out for this information.

Flash of Enormous Importance.—It suddenly occurs to me that he is pointing not to the reeds, but to a small house in the distance ; and his meaning is, that this place belongs to Coutts's, the bankers, and that they preserve it strictly. I run on to Wetherby.

I say to him, "You know the Coutts's?" He does.

Very well. Breathless I indicate what I suppose to be their fishing-lodge on the other side of the Lake. I repeat the Fisherman's information ; namely, that the Coutts's go up and down from the Bank (this is my version), but are mostly there—that is, at the fishing-lodge. "If so," says Wetherby, "it will be worth while calling. Won't it, Betty?" turning to Lady Wetherby, who answers, "Decidedly;" that "it will be an excellent plan, as it will ensure him the fishing, if not for to-day, at all events for the future."

We return to the Fisherman, who is still standing contemplating us.

"Are the family at home?" asks Wetherby.

The Man doesn't seem to understand. Wetherby repeats his question.

"There's only my Missus," the Man replies, evidently puzzled by our coming back so interested in his domestic affairs.

"No," says Wetherby, "I mean Mr. Coutts."

The Man looks at me for an explanation.

I remind him that he has just informed me how there are Couttses over there ; and I point in the direction already indicated by him.

"So there are," he replies, rather sulkily, as if we were either making fun of him, or didn't believe his statement.

I nod at Wetherby, as much as to say, "There—you hear I'm right!"

The Man continues, "Hundreds of 'em."

"Hundreds of Coutts's!" exclaims Wetherby. "Perhaps he means at Coutts's."

"Ay," returns the Man, rather nettled, and eyeing Wetherby in anything but a friendly manner, "hundreds—thousands of 'em. There's one on 'em now"—we are both deeply interested, and follow the line of his finger—"he's sitting in among the rushes."

"Sitting in the rushes!" says Wetherby.

I begin to think that Somebody's been mistaken.

A harsh croak, like that of a frog in summer time, diverts our attention.

"That's him!" cries the Man.

"Him!" I can't help repeating, "Who?"

"Why"—just at this instant a small bird, like a moorhen, rises from the rushes, and flies to a distant part of the Lake—"There he goes!" cries our Fisherman. "That's a Coot! Bless you! there are hundreds o' them Coots about here."

Wetherby doesn't stay for any further explanation. He runs (I have never seen him run before) to Lady Wetherby and our party, and tells them the joke. They laugh. I know Wetherby can't keep it to himself, and it will be all over Torquay to-morrow.

Flash.—To-morrow! Off by first train. Town and my Aunt. We walk up to Kranton Castle.

CHAPTER XXXV.

AMONG THE RUINS—ROMANCE—THE LOVER'S LEAP—GIGGLING—COOTSES—FLASHES—CORRESPONDENCE—THE HARNESS CASE—EXCUSES—FAREWELL! AND IF FOR EVER—MUST SEE DOCTOR—MY HEALTH ONCE MORE—IN TRAIN—AFFECTING PARTING—JOURNEYING—ONWARDS—OPINIONS OF MESSIEURS LES VOYAGEURS—FLASH—THOUGHTS ON LEAVE-TAKINGS—AT STATIONS—TO EXETER—A NEW FACE—OLD FRIEND—PENDELL.

WE are in the ruins. Miss Straithmere ascends narrow and craggy places. Durley following. I am meditating on the Mighty Past. The days when the lover and his mistress, pursued by the King's troops, leapt on horseback from the dining-room window into the moat below. How the horses came to be in the dining-room remains unexplained. Miss Straithmere asks me why I am so dull? I reply that one can't be always giggling and scampering about. Let Durley giggle and scamper. I tell her that amid old ruins such as these I love to meditate. She replies, that that is just what she likes, too, and immediately dares me to run up a flight of steps leading half-way up an old tower. "I'll do it," she says: "will you?" No, I won't. Giggle, giggle, giggle, up she goes, Durley following. Then I hear her, higher up, "O, I shall fall! I know I shall!"—giggle, giggle, giggle.

So the afternoon passes. We return. Wetherby can't get the "Cootses" affair out of his head.

When a man can't get a joke against you out of his head, and is perpetually going off into chuckles, looking at you, going off again, telling everyone he meets, and constantly referring to you as "Coots," supposing, for example, that to be the point of the joke which he can't get out of his head, existence in his company becomes a burden.

That's the worst of Wetherby : this joke against me will last him for years. Like Shakspeare, the joke isn't for an age, but for all time. Perhaps Wetherby will hand it down in his will to his descendants.

Flash of Imagination.—Properties are held on odd conditions. His might be held on the condition of his heir telling a story once a year in the presence of witnesses—say the story of the Coot. If he failed, or exaggerated, or added to it, or diminished it, the property to go to next of kin, or a hospital.

Letter from my Aunt.—She will meet me at the Exeter Station, on her road to Plymouth. It encloses a letter from her Solicitor (in re the Harness Case) :—"Dear Madam,—We regret that we are unable to give your nephew a brief in this matter. We have got Mr. Croaker, Q.C., and our usual Juniors. As one of the numerous plaintiffs in this action, your interests shall receive our best attention."

A Note from Budd.—"Met your Aunt. Harness case no go for you. They've got another man. Cheer up. Samuel says you ought to come here and wash."

The last line is his way of expressing Samuel's opinion that I am in want of a Turkish Bath.

Farewell, Torquay. Farewell, Miss Straithmere.

O dear no! not yet! she is coming with me and Wetherby (who is going to drive) up to the station.

She remarks that I appear quite pleased to be going away.
Why?

I tell her that I am not pleased, and that I should like to stay here much longer.

"Then," she asks, "why don't you?"

Now as I am Wetherby's guest, not hers, the question in his presence is awkward. I can't reply, because he hasn't asked me. Torquay, however, doesn't agree with me. The sea doesn't, and the land doesn't, and, except on this morning of my departure, I have not felt what is called "the thing," since I've been here.

I reply that I must go up to town and see my Doctor.

Why?

I have a great mind to enter into details, and if I knew scientific terms I would, and she'd never ask "why" again.

The station prevents further conversation.

Tickets taken; rugs in. Luggage safely bestowed. Porter tipped. Guard confidentially polite. Wetherby talking to somebody outside. We are together on the platform.

She is not giggling now, but sentimental.

So sentimental that people can't help watching us, thinking, I am sure, that I am a soldier leaving for India, or an explorer going to Central Africa.

I smile, to lighten up the proceedings, and say I must get a paper.

"Why do you get a paper?" she asks in a melancholy tone, catching (I see her) the people's eyes all about, and evidently conscious of the sensation she is creating.

A tall and fashionably dressed woman, nearly six feet without heels and chignon, weeping over a small man at a Railway Station is calculated to attract attention.

Flash.—To get her into a ladies' waiting-room and leave her there, or round a corner out of sight.

No. At the bookstall she is at my elbow drooping over me like a helpless Niobe.

I ought, in the presence of an audience, to turn round and embrace her, comfort her, console her, but how can I?

She is so impressionable, that she (in view of this confounded audience which she has attracted) is making herself cry with her own imaginary sentiment. I know as well as possible that if Durley would turn up, or the French Count, or anybody, with whom she could play a new rôle, the whole scene would be changed, and I should get into the train, unwept for, uncared for—and precious glad to do it.

Flash of Decision.—Seat myself in the carriage.

I do so; walking sharply to it. People on platform evidently consider me a brute. In their opinion I am (I see) a cruel, hard man, who won't say good-bye to his wife; and, if it wasn't for lookers-on, would probably beat her.

Seated in the Carriage.—She stands by the door. Drooping. I am sensible of spectators having changed their position on purpose to watch my proceedings. I shouldn't be surprised to hear that they were betting on whether I shall hit her, or not, just before we start. Passengers getting out, along the line, for refreshment, will nudge their friends, and indicate me as being the Brutal Husband. There may be another view of the case, which, if they consider it worse, they will of course take.

I say cheerfully, "Well, good bye, Miss Straithmere; don't let me keep you standing here, as I've no doubt Wetherby will be waiting for you."

She replies sorrowfully, "No! (sigh) he is not waiting for me." She shoots a reproachful glance at me, and another, out of the same revolvers, at the audience, who, I should imagine, now think that I am refusing to support my wife and family during my absence.

Flash.—What a nuisance it is, after you're once in a railway carriage, for any one to remain standing at the door "to wish you good bye." They have said all that is to be said—you have shaken hands. You are pretty sure you've not forgotten anything. If the carriage is full you can't enter into domestic matters, or into any affairs of a private nature, and ordinary topics are out of the question. The time can be unsatisfactorily filled up with such original remarks as, "I think we shall have a nice journey." "I hope so." "It will be hot." "Do you think so? No, not sitting this side." "Give my love to Annie." This generally interests all your fellow-travellers. "You'll see Mrs. Wigsby when you arrive." You nod a wish to discontinue the conversation, feeling that it is beginning to bore the other people in the carriage and that they're laughing at you for knowing Mrs. Wigsby. "You've got your sandwiches and the flask?" is asked by considerate person at the door. You nod affirmatively. ("Greedy fellow," think the passengers.) "You'll take care and wrap up if you feel cold?" Again you nod. ("What a coddle," think the passengers.) And at last you are off. Obligated to nod and smile and shake your hand up to the last moment, as much as to say, "No accident as yet, you see! There, we've got several yards along by the platform, and the engine hasn't burst! Aha! good omen! Bless you!"—And in another five minutes you're somewhere else.

As I am now. Thank goodness ! To Exeter. At the first station a gentleman gets into the carriage. He is evidently very near-sighted, as he stumbles over my legs, turns to beg pardon of my great coat, which is on the seat opposite me, and then carefully inspects the middle cushion to find out if anyone is there.

“ Um ! ” he says, shortly to himself ; “ Bless my soul ! ” This very jerkily and shortly. “ Ah ! ” Then he nearly closes both eyes as a means of seeing better, and seating himself on the edge of the cushion turns towards me.

Flash of Recognition.—Pendell. Whom I haven't seen for years.

“ LESS my soul!” exclaims Pendell, tapping his own shoulder, and feeling his chest all over, in order to find out where on earth his eye-glass has got to. Failing in his attempts to catch it anywhere, he adopts the alternative of screwing up his eyes, and thrusting his head well forward towards me, then he repeats in his jerky manner, “La!—um—so it is! Aha! Bless my soul! Very extr’ord’nary! Who’d have thought it!” Then suddenly, as if by inspiration, “How d’ye do?”

Then we shake hands. After this he goes on more to himself than me. “Odd! . . . why it must be—dear me!”—here he taps his breast-pocket, and appears puzzled. I ask him has he lost anything?

“Eh?” he replies—“No.” Then with a short laugh, and diving into his right-hand pocket, “No—only my spectacles—I’m always losing them. Very extr’ord’nary! Ah! here they are"—in his coat-tail pocket, whence he produces an old-fashioned leather case, from which he takes a pair of spectacles, and, having wiped them carefully, and tried them first, by holding them several inches away from him, where, I am persuaded, he cannot see them at all, he adjusts them on his nose, blinks several times, then takes a good look at me through them. This examination proving my identity to his satisfaction, he says, "Ah! dear me! . . . so it is! . . . Bless my soul! Very extr'ord'nary! . . . got very stout, eh?"

I retort upon him with, "Well, you've got very bald since I last saw you."

He passes his hand over his head with quite a surprised look, as if he'd had plenty of hair in the morning, but had somehow lost it since breakfast. Ascertaining by this process that my information is not altogether incorrect, he replies, "Ah, yes! um—but—um—I've a great deal more hair than I had a year ago."

I tell him, when we become confidential, that I am travelling for the benefit of my health, to find some place to suit me, and reduce this tendency to stoutness. On hearing that I am engaged upon a literary work (my Analytical History of Motion, which I have not touched for some time), he proposes that I should come and stop with him.

"I think," says he, considering the matter, frowningly, "the air of our place would be just the thing for you . . . yes—um—just the very thing. We're very quiet—but—um—there's sport . . . no shooting to speak of . . . and hunting just begun . . . and——" evidently finding that he has exhausted all the resources of his country, he finishes up with—"and all that sort of thing."

I thank him, and ask him where he lives. "O!" he says, as if this was a sort of home-thrust on my part, and he wasn't prepared for it, "O—ah—yes—" then he laughs shortly,—“rather out of the way—Cornwall—” Here he pauses, and looks straight at me, as much as to say, “What do you think of that?”

I say, “O, indeed! Cornwall!” as quite a matter of course. If he'd said “Northumberland” or “Nova Scotia,” my reply would probably have been the same. After all, why shouldn't he live in Cornwall, or in Northumberland, or in Nova Scotia?

“Yes,” he continues, apparently pleased at finding that I neither go off into fits of laughter, nor throw any doubt upon his information: “Cornwall . . . Penwiffle . . . Cornwall.” Then he looks at me once more, to see how I take this.

Flash.—He's evidently been accustomed to meet with ill-bred strangers, who, on hearing the name of “Penwiffle, Cornwall,” have been very much amused, and been unable to repress their merriment. I, on the contrary, take it gravely, as if an existence at Penwiffle was a matter too serious for joking.

I tell him that if I don't find my Aunt at Exeter, I will return with him. He is going to Exeter on business, and this will suit him.

“We're a very quiet party,” he says, presently, in an apologetic tone, “Perhaps too quiet for you . . . no balls . . . or parties.”

Flash.—Does he begin to be sorry he's asked me? Why should he think I'm not quiet?

I reply that I prefer quiet, and that I think I've been having too much excitement and worry lately. My thoughts revert to the yacht, and Miss Straithmere.

“Ah! that's all right, then,” returns Pendell, clearly much relieved at hearing from myself that I do not want a large dinner party every evening with a masked ball three times a week. Then he continues, always jerkily, as if giving me the dramatis personæ of Penwiffle—"There's only my wife . . um—she'll be delighted to see you—um."

He stops, and I put in, feeling obliged to say something, "You're married, eh?"

After-Flash.—Stupid observation on my part. He tells me he has got a wife, and I ask him if he's married.

Note.—Not to do this again.

Pendell sees no offence in the interruption, and answers, "O yes. Married eight years ago. . . Six children. Six—um—six—" thinks it over; then repeats, as if he'd just arrived at the sum total—"Yes, six children."

"How old is the oldest?" I ask.

Flash. Haven't I done wrong in accepting an invitation where there are six children? Time to reverse my decision before reaching Exeter.

"Ah!" he exclaims, then repeats my question. "How old? . . . um . . . let me see. Well—um." Then, with a laugh—"I don't know. But," he reassures me, "my wife does—she knows—" then to himself, and looking away from me towards the other window—"she knows."

Silence for some time. Pendell, who has evidently been turning over in his mind, what I've told him about my book, suddenly observes, "If you're writing—um—I can show you lots of character . . . plenty of character in Cornwall." I thank him. I like character.

"O yes," he continues, "we'll have a very jolly time." He is quite brightening up in anticipation of my visit. This is hearty and hospitable. "Yes—let me see. I'll ask Old Ruddock, of Polkivel, to meet you"—this sounds interesting—"he'll amuse you . . . and—yes—my stepmother's staying with us now . . . she's deaf . . . very deaf . . . and—um—my wife's a great invalid—you won't see much of her . . . and—there's my half brother . . . don't suppose you've ever met him . . . he's got over a fever lately . . . and . . . he's—um—he's a little silly in his head . . . but"—cheering up again—"I'll ask Old Ruddock to meet you one night at dinner; he'll amuse you—he's a great character," here he finishes with a laugh at some comic reminiscence of Old Ruddock of Polkivel.

"He's very amusing, then, eh?" I ask, smiling, and getting up as much interest as I possibly can in Old Ruddock, whom, somehow, I dislike intuitively.

Flash (of Straithmere).—"Why" dislike him? Ans.—Don't know.

Pendell answers my question enthusiastically. "O yes, Old Ruddock—ha! ha!" here he laughs, evidently at some joke of the old wag—"Old Ruddock!—he'll amuse you—if he'll only talk. That's it," he continues, his enthusiasm suddenly cooling down, on this reservation about Old Ruddock occurring to him, "That's it . . . if he'll talk. Sometimes, when he doesn't know people, he won't say a word."

Clearly an entertaining person, Old Ruddock.

Exeter. No Aunt. When Pendell has finished his business, go back with him to Penwiffle, Cornwall.

THE STATION.—(Cornwall.) Pendell says that we have four miles to drive before we arrive at his house. Dark night. Drizzling, slightly. "O yes," says he, in answer to my question as to the means of conveyance, "My trap'll be here." Hope so, sincerely. In a new atmosphere, in a fresh county, before you're, as it were, acclimatised, there's nothing so dangerous as getting damped; not wet through, but damped. It means rheumatism, cramps, pains, shootings, and all the fearful things that appear in an advertised list of complaints curable by some patent medicine.

Pendell says to me, quietly, "You notice the Station-Master. He's a character." I ask him if he's as great a character as Old Ruddock, whom he mentioned. "Ah!" he says, snacking his lips, "he's a character," and then he laughs "Ha!

ha!" abruptly, as if at some recollection of a joke of Old Ruddock's.

First Notes on Cornwall (which I make while Pendell is giving directions to the Porter about the luggage). Strange dialect, as if the people were more or less angry with one another. That's the first impression. My second impression is, that I don't understand more than half of what they're saying.

A labourer is leaning against the railings, and speaking to the Station-Master. I watch him, expecting to hear something from the "character." I fancy that (as it does not sound angrily in this instance) a joke, a retort, and a repartee, have passed between them; and that the Station-Master, judging from his sudden silence, while the others are laughing, is getting the worst of it. Noting down the only repartee that I am able to catch, I find that it sounds something like this:—

Roars of laughter at this sally. "The character" walks off silently. Perhaps this is what makes him a character. Then they look round at me.

Flash.—Being in a strange country, ingratiate yourself with the people. A smile does it. I smile, and I think it does it. They look at one another as much as to say, "He's not such a bad sort of fellow after all, though he doesn't belong to these parts." Talking of getting on well in a strange country, reminds me that I once met a man who knew no language but his own, and who told me that he had never had any sort of difficulty in making himself understood abroad by smiles, nods, and by knowing the names and airs of several songs out of Italian Operas, and also of some popular French ballads. Oh the strength of this last accomplishment, he told me he stopped for nearly a week as the guest of a distinguished Family in Switzerland, who, I suppose (the truth has occurred to me since), didn't know how to get rid of him, because they couldn't say good-bye in English. He also told me that he very nearly married an Italian Countess, whom he met at a small inn on the Rhine, and with whom, after table d'hôte, he had exchanged the names and tunes of at least twenty songs while sitting out in the moonlight sipping May-wine, and smoking mild tobacco. He had a scheme for proposing to her which was very simple. He was going (he told me) to have turned his signet ring round so as to conceal the stone, and only show the plain gold semi-circle, and to have proffered this, touching his heart with it first, and then raising his eyebrows inquiringly, and singing "Tu m'ami!" from Les Huguenots. This ingenious plan came to nothing, however; as, while he was arranging his ring, and settling the proper key for his tune, he noticed a wedding-ring and a keeper on the lady's finger. This settled the question, so he simply sang the "Good Night" from the Barber of Seville (which, by the way, he pronounces "Boney Sarah" (not much of a compliment to the Italian Countess), and by adding "Partons pour la Syrie," implied that he was off next morning for Mayence, allegorically represented by the Syria of the song. I also notice——

Pendell reappears. "Hallo!" he exclaims, "here you are!" Then, with a short laugh, "Aha! I've been looking for you, everywhere. Aha! I'm so short-sighted, and this light so bad, that I can hardly see two inches in front of me."

I follow him out. A gig is in waiting for us. "Jeroboam!" Pendell suddenly calls out, peering into the darkness.

Flash.—I am startled. There's an awful sound about it. In the darkness, in a new county, with a shadowy gig-horse before me, suddenly to hear a voice challenging a reply from out of the gloom, with "Jeroboam!"

Is it a pass-word? No . . . A voice says—
"Yezzur."

The answer proceeds, apparently, from the horse's mouth.

Intelligent Flash.—Cornwall is a County of Legends and Poetic Tradition, and I see at once how this occurrence, if handed down from generation to generation, would become at last the well-known story of Pendell's Talking Horse.

Being accustomed to the light, or rather want of it, I now perceive a man holding the horse. This is Jeroboam.

"Ah!" says Pendell, in a satisfied tone; "that's all right. Jeroboam will bring the luggage after us in a cart: he'll sit on it, and—um—um—" here he is mounting to the driving seat. "Methusaleh will drive him home."

I feel that I open my mouth, nose, and lift my eyebrows with astonishment. Extraordinary place, Cornwall!

Jeroboam sitting on my luggage in a donkey-cart, driven by Methusaleh!

I repeat, aloud, to myself, "Jeroboam."

"Ah!" says Pendell, "he's a character—quite a character." "So," he adds, after a little thought, probably to compare the two. "So is Methusaleh!"

I wonder to myself whether they're characters like Old Ruddock and the Station-Master.

Nil admirari—but I can't help remarking to Pendell that these names sound a little odd.

"Ah, yes," he replies; "yes"—he is leaning well forward, always peering into the darkness—"You may let her go, Jeroboam."

Jeroboam obeys, and the mare starts, showing an inclination at first, for the right-hand side of the road.

"Um!" says Pendell, smacking his lips, and then shaking his head. "Very extr'ord'nary!"

I ask if anything's the matter?

"No," he returns; "she's a little restive, p'r'aps, after standing about"—then he suddenly shouts out, "Hey!" to something on his right.

It is one of the posts of the gate leading out of the station.

"Aha!" he laughs, on discovering this; "I am getting so blind at night, I don't think I can see an inch before me." Perhaps the post is a character. Shouldn't be surprised.

We have four miles to drive.

Mild Inquiry.—"I suppose—at least I sincerely hope, that it's a pretty straight road to your house."

"Um!" replies Pendell, considering—"nasty in parts; sharp turnings and narrow lanes." Again he shouts out, "Hey!" meaning that somebody, or something, on his right, is to get out of his way.

It is the corner of a parapet, which, I can clearly see, even on such a night as this, borders a bridge over the river.

"I was once talking to a fellow who was sitting beside me when I was driving," says Pendell, with a keen relish of the humour of the proceeding, "and we came right up against the corner that we've just passed."

It occurs to me to ask him, "Do you often drive?"

"Drive!" he repeats: "Lor' bless you! yes—always." Then, with his usual short laugh, "Aha—um! I very seldom have any accidents—very seldom. Get up, Conjuror! Tch! Conjuror! Pst—st—st!" All this to the horse, whose name, I perceive, is Conjuror. I can't help asking Pendell why he called his horse Conjuror.

"Ah, yes," says he, evidently pleased, "I called him Conjuror, because of his tricks."

"What tricks?"

"Oh, all sorts"—here Conjuror stumbles—"Whoop, Conjuror! Hallo! Tchik! old horse!" Then he whistles, and peers into the darkness.

Flash.—Better not talk to him, or distract his attention from his driving.

"It's all pretty clear here," he says.

We are on a broad road. I am sure something is in front of us. A large waggon, I fancy, coming towards us. I don't like exactly to point out such an object as this to him. He might think that I was interfering. He doesn't seem to see it. We are driving, too, on our wrong side. I hardly like, either, to remark on this novelty, as it may be a Cornish as well as a French custom.

I am sure it is a large waggon coming towards us. Most dangerous. I ask, "Isn't there a ——" He interrupts me; "Ah," he says, thrusting his head forward, "I was—um—wondering whether that was anything. I can't," he adds, slowly, and not checking the horse's trot for a second, "I can't make out whether it's a man or a cart."

Half a minute decides the question. A loud shout from the waggoner, who is luckily walking by the side of his team, a sudden pull over to the left on Pendell's part, I grasp the side of the gig, and in another three seconds we have passed by the waggon.

Flash.—Not show nervousness. Be cheerful over it. Say "Ah! that was near."

Pendell stamps on the footboard, and laughs heartily. "Near!" he exclaims, "oho—um—that's nothing! Pst-tchk! Get away with you, Conjuror!"

"Wouldn't he find it useful to wear his spectacles," I suggest.

"No, not a bit," he replies, "Spectacles—no good at night."

"But lamps," I say; "wouldn't you find lamps of some service?"

"O yes," he replies; "most people use 'em about here. But I don't when I'm driving myself. Can't see anything when I've got lamps. Get up, old Conjuror!"—which adjuration seems necessary, old Conjuror having been, for the third time, as nearly down on his nose as ever I saw a horse. "Pst-tchk——." I feel a sort of scooping motion, as if I was being shovelled round somewhere in a spoon, while Pendell is tilted up a little on his side. Then the bump of a rut,—and Pendell and I are sitting evenly again.

Flash.—We have just come round one of the nasty corners. Perhaps the nastiest. I ask him if this is so. "O no," he replies, "that's nothing."

"But," I protest, "your side was up on the bank."

"Was it?" he says; then adds, confidentially, "Well, the fact is, that turning took me by surprise. The old mare knew it . . . Conjuror knew it . . . um—but I thought it was further on, pst-tchk!" Here he chuckles to himself as if the chance of an accident was the funniest thing he'd known for a long time. I ask him what amuses him? He replies, "Oh—Old Ruddock—aha!—he's quite a character. You must meet him—aha"—and we're nearly into a ditch, or hole of some sort.

Bang—jerk—bump. Ruts. Nearly out of our seats. "Most of our roads are first-rate here," he informs me; "but this bit —um—I don't know—um—I must speak at our Board meeting about this”

Bump—bump, jerk, bump. Holding on. Whish! up on my side, down on his; result, we are round another corner, safely.

Three more corners. Then Pendell asks, “Can you see a gate before you, eh?”

Before I have time to reply that I have noticed something white, Conjurer, who doesn't want to be pulled up, cleverly saves his nose by stopping short of the gate by a foot.

“Aha! shut! bless my soul—um—that's that idiot Jeroboam.” Pendell gives me the reins, and descends. He opens the gate, and I drive in.

“Here we are!” says Pendell, remounted on the box. We are driving up an avenue. Beyond this I can see nothing. But there are no more corners. Lights from the windows of the house visible at last. I almost expect to find my hair turned white in a single night when I get down.

“Welcome,” says Pendell, cheerily, “to Penwiffle.” Then suddenly to himself, “I wonder”—“What?” I ask. “I was wondering,” he says, “if Jehoshaphat's in.” Then he bawls, “Jehoshaphat.”

Good gracious! What a set of names!

JEHOSHAPHAT emerges from somewhere with a lantern, or—it being so dark it flashes across me that—

The Flash.—A lantern emerges from somewhere with Jehoshaphat.

Then lantern, Jehoshaphat, horse, and trap vanish into the gloom.

A burst of light, and we are in the hall of Penwiffle Priory.

Flash.—Why Priory?

I ask this. “Eh?” replies Pendell, pausing in taking off his top-coat to consider the matter; this evidently being quite a new idea to him.

Note.—A Stranger is valuable in a place to which you’ve become accustomed, because he starts some new ideas. I recollect a friend who had lived for two years in what he called a Country Paradise. Stranger came down. “Charming, eh?” said my friend, expecting Stranger to be in raptures. “Um!” replied Stranger, sniffing—(startling to get a Sniffing Stranger—it makes you look about, and arouses suspicion)—“What’s the matter?" asked my friend, uneasily. "Drains all right here, eh?" asked the Sniffing Stranger, breaking it to him gently. Then—I remember well what happened then—my friend became nervous; he lived with cans of disinfecting fluid, and nuisance-destroying powders in his hand. He was up early—he and the Stranger—both sniffing all over the garden, and making points, like truffle-dogs when they found anything under their noses, and above their comprehension. Then came discussions with gardener, groom, carpenter, bricklayer, well-sinker, labourer, with suggestions from Builders, and sketches from Architects; and, finally—the property was ruined, and so was my friend's health. There's the secret out at last, nomine mutato (I haven't given a name except to call him "my friend") fabula narratur de Me. That's the secret of my want of Health. I can trace it all back to that, I believe; and now when I go to a friend's Happy Healthy Home, the first thing I do—if he glories in its being peculiarly healthy—is to sniff. Few men can stand it. Pendell doesn't boast that his place is so eminently salubrious, but I've brought him one fresh idea to begin with. It is, "Why is your property called the Priory?" He's been here ten years, and he owns that no one has ever asked him this question before.

It puzzles him. He ejaculates to himself several times, "Very extr'ord'nary!" and is evidently bothered. He takes off his coat: So do I. He ushers me into the drawing-room: quintessence of comfort. Really easy chairs. Nobody here. I sink into one chair. He into another. Then I hear him repeating to himself, as he frowns at the log fire, "Why, Priory?"

"Yes," he says, presently stretching himself, and standing up on the hearth-rug, "Confound it!" he is evidently annoyed, "Why, Priory?"

Flash of mine, in order to relieve him.—Perhaps the tenant, prior to you, might have called it so, because you were coming afterwards. This satisfies neither of us. Pendell regrets that his wife is not up, or she would have given us the real history of the Priory. “She knows all about it,” he tells me. “She’ll tell you, you’ll see ; but,” he adds, “Old Ruddock is well up in all the County History, and he’s sure to be right.”

I notice that he never can mention Old Ruddock’s name without smiling to himself at some of this old gentleman’s facetiae. I begin to long to meet Old Ruddock. I don’t know why, I picture him as a tall man in knee-breeches and top-boots, with a low-crowned hat, but I do. In my mind’s eye I see Old Ruddock.

“They’ve put out supper for us,” observes Pendell, making a move.

The Dining Room. More quintessences of comfort. If we’d been ogres coming in after an unsuccessful hunt for small boys, we couldn’t be more sumptuously provided for. Pies, ham, beef, jug, and tankard. Pendell says he’s not much of a supper-eater. I tell him I never take it, as a rule.

Flash. Make a remarkable exception. Pie, beef, home-brewed ale—“that won’t hurt you,” says Pendell, who suddenly takes me in hand, medically,—and a cigar with a glass of real Irish whisky as a “corrective.”

Result. Both seated before fire. I hear Pendell murmur, “Why Priory? very extr’ord’nary!” Some answer is occurring to me when I seem suddenly to be puzzling myself as to whether I have answered or not, and then I am awoken by a loud snore, and my head jerks forward as if a spring had given way somewhere at the nape of my neck.

"Hallo!" exclaims Pendell. Then it occurs to me that, if the snore was mine, it is time for bed.

I go to bed half asleep, I undress three-quarters asleep, only conscious of not throwing my things into the fire, but anywhere else, about the floor. I think I wind up my watch. Three-quarters and a half I roll into bed.

In Bed, Fall asleep. First night at Penwiffle in search of Health.

PENDELL, of Penwiffle, is up early. Chi-rr-up-ing. Talking to dogs and dependents. Three of the dependents are cats, one of them being a remarkably fine specimen. "Quite like a dog," says Pendell. "Most extr'ord'nary cat." He is fresh. I am not. He comes into my room and draws the curtains. I expected to have jumped out of bed invigorated by the air of Cornwall, and inhaled new life through the open window. On the contrary, I beg him not to open the window. The tip of my nose feels like an anti-climax. I mean it is burningly cold, or frigidly hot. The bridge seems very much larger than usual.

Flash.—Not the Bridge of Sighs, but the Bridge of Double the Size.

I feel that if I get up I shall have a lively headache. I feel that, also, if I lie in bed I shall have a sleepy headache. My eyes ache.

"I am afraid," I say to Pendell, "that Cornwall doesn't agree with me."

"Hum!" he replies, with his usual short laugh; "he! he!—um—you took too much supper last night."

I don't think (as far as I can think, mistily, about anything, in my present condition, and in bed) that Pendell is right. No man likes to be told that the place where he lives is in any way unhealthy. If you tell him that there's a dampness somewhere about, he will be offended, and retort, "Oh no! impossible!" If you insist upon it, he will think you disagreeable, and won't ask you again when you particularly want an invitation. If you further press upon him that, to live in such an atmosphere, or, rather, to remain for only a few hours breathing such poison, is dangerous, he will point to himself and his children, and say, "Look here! we're all very well!" And if they are, you can only add, "Well, you'll see;" as much as to say, "There! I've warned you."

Pendell will have it that I ate too much at supper; that I eat too much generally; that I don't take sufficient exercise; that I sleep too long, and go to bed too late. That, in fact, I do everything too something or other.

As for Penwiffle in any way disagreeing with me, he won't hear of it.

Breakfast.—No appetite. Bad sign. Hospitality always shows out in sideboard arrangements. Cold things on sideboard. Hot things on a sort of steel gridiron before the fire. Mrs. Pendell down. Picture of health. Wish I was. Children at their music lesson. It sounds as if somebody was tuning only five notes of the piano, and couldn't get 'em right anyhow. Begin to feel that The Last Rose of Summer is being played as a tuner's dirge, in my head. I follow it: tum, tum (pause), tum, then a high tum, as if a successful jump had been made, and the performer had alighted safely, and was taking breath. Children are, I am informed, going away to-day for a week's holiday to their grandmamma's. Of course I express my regret.

Pendell has arranged, he says, a day for me. We're to go and see Tintagel. And be home to dinner to meet Ruddock. Pendell never can mention "Old Ruddock" without laughing. His wife smiles too. Ruddock is evidently the wag of this locality.

I calculate on the effects of what to-day's exercise will be on me. Change of atmosphere. Walking. Jolting, when driving. Laughing in the evening at Ruddock's jests.

A carriage comes to fetch us. Pendell is not going to drive. A relief. He whispers in my ear that he doesn't drive to-day as he has hired a carriage and horses for the trip, on purpose that I may see the driver, because "he's such a character."

"Is he?" I say, and look at him as he sits on the box. A weather-beaten, crabbed face, and dressed not unlike an undertaker in top-boots. I remark, as we start, in what a lovely situation Penwiffe is placed. Fine bold view of hill and dale.

Note.—This makes up for having hinted at its not agreeing with me.

Pendell is very anxious that we should go through some village, and stop at the inn to make some trivial inquiry. "Just," he says, in explanation, "to draw the Landlord out. I want you to see him—um—aha!—he's a regular character. He's well known about here. Quite a character."

Our Coachman has as yet (and we've been five miles) done nothing to entitle himself to being ranked among the Cornwall "characters." He returns a "Yes" or "No" to a question, drives very carefully, and knows the road well.

On reflection, perhaps this is what makes him a Character. Other Cornishmen would, it may be, give you a rigmarole by way of reply, drive recklessly, and take the wrong turnings.

The Landlord of the Three Crows.—He comes out. A tall, fresh-looking man, dressed in gamekeeperish fashion. I watch the process by which Pendell is going to "draw out" this character for my special amusement.

"Good morning, Mr. Benny," says Pendell.

"Morning, Sir," says Mr. Benny. Both cheerily.

So far the exhausting process hasn't done much. I wait.

"Fine morning, eh?" says Pendell, with a laugh. I smile too, out of compliment, and in a general way to encourage the performance. Now is Mr. Benny's time to come out as a character.

"Yes, Sir, it is fine," he replies cheerfully, "for the time of year."

"Yes," returns Pendell, and looks at me, and laughs.

I laugh, too. Why, I don't know. I've not noticed any eccentricity on the part of Mr. Benny. Ah! he's going to give us a witticism now.

He says, "Will you step in, Gentlemen, and take a glass of anything?"

"No, thank you: much obliged," answers Pendell.

I express myself to the same effect. Mr. Benny raises his hat politely, we bow royally, our Coachman gives a flick of the whip to his horses (perhaps this is a touch of character), and on we go again.

I look back to see if Mr. Benny shows any signs of eccentric character when we're gone. I rather expect to see he's throwing his hat up, doing a few funny steps in the road, or letting off a firework. No, he is talking quite quietly to a farming man : and so we gradually lose sight of him.

"Is Mr. Benny a great character?" I ask Pendell.

Pendell looks at me with surprise, as much as to say, "Why! Good gracious! didn't you see what a character he was? Didn't I draw him out for you?" But he only says, "O, yes—um—he's a great character."

A wild road. Dartmoor generally visible with an association about it of mists and convicts. Houses put down at hap-hazard in different spots at a considerable distance from one another. A mansion in the distance, five miles off from its own lodge-gates.

"Nice little distance," Pendell observes, "if you want to send down to the lodge-keeper to tell him you're not at home if anybody calls."

Flash.—Private telegraph on grounds.

Pendell thinks this is a Notion. He will mention it to the owner.

Note.—As I've remarked before, a visitor always brings new ideas with him.

This suggestion of mine—to what may it not lead?

Telegraphs private, public, new stations, new lines, more houses, united villages, entirely New Town.

Pendell wishes our driver (the character) to take the right road instead of the left. He does so. "It's a little longer, perhaps," he observes, "but you'll see Mr. Torble the clergyman here."

"A Character?" I ask.

"O quite. He's always standing at his door."

We drive on. Eagerly watching for a sight of old Torble, Pendell puts on his spectacles, and asks the driver to point out

Mr. Torble's rectory. I am, in consequence, shown it, half a mile off. More excitement. We come up to it. We drive slowly before it. There is the door where he always stands—except on this particular occasion.

"Odd!" mutters Pendell to himself. He is evidently disappointed. After some consideration he informs me that "perhaps he saw the carriage coming, and went in. Because," he adds, "old Torble is shy . . . and—um—perhaps he didn't want to be at home to visitors. He's quite a character."

Notes and Statistics made on the Road.—The banks on either side as you get towards the coast look as if thousands of revolutionary schoolboys had got loose, had broken their slates, and stuck the bits all about, everywhere.

Note 2.—A stone-breaker on the road. It flashes across me that I've never heard of a stone-breaker rising to any social eminence. Perhaps they take to it too late in life.

Note 3.—Everyone in Cornwall is a Character. But residence is absolutely necessary to the drawing out their eccentricities.

For instance, the Postman at Penwiffle, Pendell says, "is a regular character." It subsequently appears that what Pendell means by this is, that the Postman sometimes delivers the wrong letter, sometimes forgets them altogether, and often mislays a newspaper or a packet. I suggest as an amendment in the description, "an irregular character."

Another character is a coachman at a friend's house. Pendell tells me that Isaac (his friend's coachman) is quite a character. He is summoned from the stable for my special examination. He staggers up, and is so stupid as to be unintelligible. They say, "O, he's quite a character." I say to myself, "he's nearly drunk." Pendell informs me that he has distinguished himself as a "character" by upsetting the carriage twice, and by once, accidentally, setting fire to the stable. However, in consideration of his being a character, these incidents in his career were overlooked as belonging to the eccentricities of genius.

Note 4.—Jeroboam, David, Noah, and other Scriptural names are quite common; and they all throng to "little Bethels" on Sunday.

Note 5.—When a man's name is not Scriptural, you may be pretty certain he is called George.

Note 6.—The cows in Cornwall are remarkably intelligent. They get drunk on oats. I saw one in this state for an hour. Luckily, the cow couldn't see me. "Do I know," says Pendell, "what to do with 'em when they're like this."

A Flash.—Soda-water in troughs. (Send this idea to Mr. Mechi. Just the thing for a model farm at Christmas.)

Note 7.—You are always going up-hill in Cornwall. Coming down is only an exception that proves the rule.

Note 8.—"The woman who is to show us over Tintagel Castle is a regular character," says Pendell. "She's always in her cottage." We call. She isn't. "Just like her!" says Pendell.

On the summit of Tintagel. Among the ruins. Tennysonian inspiration for an Arthurian idyll :—

Let us be agile,
Climb up Tintagel,
Ruin so fragile,

I explain to Pendell—"agile" pronounced "agel" by poetic licence. Difference of opinion. Hot work climbing up here. Hungry. Good sign. Sea breeze. More hungry. Let us descend to the Inn. "Um!" says Pendell; "you must see the Landlady there : she's quite a character."

CHAPTER XL.

ARTHUR'S SEAT—CASTLE-CHAPEL—WILD FLOWERS—INFORMATION—LUNCHEON—RETURN—HOUNDS TO-MORROW—AFTER THE OTTER—NERVOUSNESS—THRILL—FLASH—VIEWS—IDEAS—BOOTS—CORDS—HOW ABOUT DRIVING?—“J. TINTAGEL is magnificent. We climb up to the highest point, and are glad to lie down first, then calmly sit up and admire the view. Tintagel has, indeed, a “character.” Pendell points out the wild flowers to me, with the information that he doesn't know anything about them. We examine the site of the old chapel in the Castle, and find the probable position of the ancient altar. Pendell observes that my surmises are likely to be right; but the only person who knows everything about it is the old clergyman Torble, who ought to have been standing at his garden gate when we passed, but wasn't. Then we descend the height, and go to the inn for luncheon. After this we return from Tintagel—tired. Evidently not strong, because I sleep all the way back in the trap. Pendell says, “Aha!—um—that's not weakness. You ate too much lunch. Get you all right to-morrow, with a run with the otter hounds. Last day of the season.”

Flash, across me.—I've not ridden for a long time. Got no boots or breeches with me. "Nothing I should have enjoyed so much," I say, "only that—" then I give my reason. Note on, and to myself. I'm sure that my stay at My Aunt's has made me nervous. I don't think that Wetherby's steam-launch improved me: and I'm sure that Pendell's driving has shattered me completely. Consequently, when he mentions suddenly a run with the hounds, I feel a sort of thrill through me, which is not exactly pleasurable; but it is not unlike what one might experience if a strong-minded medical man, to whom you had entrusted the supervision of your general health, unexpectedly turned round to you in his carriage when you thought you were out for a pleasant drive with him, and said, "Look here, I'm going to take you to Sir William Fergusson's to have you examined, and if it's necessary, he can operate at once." In my present state of nerves, I don't know what I should do on hearing such an announcement. Faint, perhaps, or let down the window and scream for assistance. In the latter case, the medical man would probably change his mind, and direct the coachman to drive to Dr. Forbes Winslow's.

I haven't asked Pendell to take me out hunting.

Flash.—Chorus of the old Tantivy song, adapted to my present circumstances—"A hunting we will 'not' go, my boys!"

I don't like—in fact I don't think it hospitable for a man, with whom you are staying for pleasure, to say arbitrarily, in effect, "Now to-morrow you will be put on a horse that you've never ridden before, whose height, length, and breadth may not suit you, whose temper you don't know, whose leaping qualifications may be extraordinary, or may not, and you will be taken on the back of this animal (as long as you remain there) over so many miles of country, so many hedges, so many stone walls (it flashes across me that they are all stone walls in Cornwall with sharp slates at the top), and whether you ever reappear again safe and sound it is impossible to conjecture ; but if you don't break your neck, or your arm, or your leg, and if you do come back all right, then—then—you'll have a capital appetite for dinner."

This all occurs to me before Pendell replies that, "There's no necessity for breeches and boots."

"Ah !" I say, with the air of a man who is accustomed to Leicestershire, "that's all very well, but it doesn't do for a stranger to appear in a field unless he's properly got up." (My mind is made up "A hunting we do not go, my boys.") I add, so as not to appear to be shirking the sport, which I admit I love, that "If Mrs. Pendell is going to drive or ride to the meet, I would accompany her ; and we could"—a little hesitation here—"we could see something of it."

It appears, however, that Mrs. Pendell is not going.

Pendell goes on to explain, that when he said breeches and boots were not necessary, he meant that I needn't ride unless I liked.

I am astonished at this suggestion. It occurs to me suddenly that I've seen a lot of good-for-nothing people in seal-skin caps and highlows in attendance at meets, specially of harriers, who by knowing the country, turn up at various checks, are in at the death, and see the whole sport on foot. They are cads, I have always imagined, who make a livelihood out of accidents on the hunting field, catching horses, holding them, opening gates, leading nervous men's horses over "nasty places," (this from experience) and so forth. A class of men I detest. They would make excellent camp-followers, and spend their summer in boating localities and at race-meetings. Surely it is not as one of these that a Cornish squire wishes me to appear in the hunting-field ! I merely say with sarcastic smile,—

“ O, I couldn't hunt on foot.”

“ I shall,” returns Pendell.

Can I believe my ears ? Yes, Pendell of Penwiffle, of the ancient Pendell Family, Squire, J.P., and Chairman of Boards, Vestries, and of everything in this part of the country where there is a chair to be taken, tells me seriously that he is going out hunting, afoot !

“ In what dress ? ” I ask, incredulously.

“ O—knickerbockers and gaiters, and—um—flannel,” he replies, and then adds, “ I can lend you flannels, they're the best for running in.”

“ But,” I ask, “ do many people run ? ”

He informs me that nearly everybody runs, as riding is almost impossible, and reminds me that he is talking of the Otter hounds.

Flash.—Ah ! of course—Ansdell's or Landseer's picture. Handsome young Keeper, in velvet, with long spear, holding up Otter, hungry dogs, open-mouthed, all around. O, that's another thing ! Ha ! ha ! I'm with him, with pleasure. If it had been fox-hounds, I now say, I was thinking whether I should have had time to have telegraphed home for my boots, and whether, if they could find them (for I fancy they were put away with a fancy dress costume of an Austrian Hussar), they could send 'em down to me here (over four hundred miles from my house), by to-morrow morning.

Otter-hunting by all means ! To-morrow ! Bravo !

Here we are at Penwiffle. In time for dinner. To meet Old Ruddock.

Mrs. Pendell tells us that a letter has just been received from Old Ruddock.

"Aha!" says Pendell, chuckling, and smacking the side of his right leg with his stick: "just like him! Aha! Old Ruddock!" Then he laughs again. It only appears from this that it's just like Old Ruddock to send a letter; nothing more. But this hardly makes him the great "character" that Pendell says he is.

It appears from this characteristic letter that Old Ruddock, of Ruddock, has accepted, by mistake ("Just like him! Aha!") interposes Pendell, enjoying the note immensely), the invitation to dinner for to-morrow night—not to-night. No Ruddock to-night.

Pendell is sorry that we are not going to have him all to ourselves, as he says to me, "You'd have drawn him out. And—and—he's a—aha!—he's a great character!"

Mrs. Pendell smiles gently at the fun, as if she were recalling some happy memory of an evening with Ruddock. I am inclined to ask her quietly if he is such a character really. Women see a character at once. She'll know. I postpone the inquiry. But I can't help being curious as to old Ruddock, of Ruddock.

Pendell is glad after all, he says, that he's not coming to-night, as he'll be such fun to-morrow, when it appears there is to be a large party.

"Let's see," says Pendell, "now there are the Tregonies of Tregivel; then there's Miss Trelissac and her brother, then Bodds of Landagle——"

"No, dear," interrupts Mrs. Pendell. "The Landagle Bodds can't come, so I sent to their cousins."

"O—um," says Pendell, as if meditating upon the social value of the change. "Ah ! the Bodds of Pophlanack—um—well ?"

Mrs. Pendell answers this inquiry with the announcement that "The Pophlanack Bodds are coming," which, on the whole, seems to satisfy Pendell, though, for choice, it is evident he would have preferred the Landagle Bodds.

I remark that he seems well off for neighbours.

"Um !" replies Pendell, thoughtfully, "Well—um—yes. The Landagle Bodds, if they'd have come, would have had to drive fifteen miles to dinner and fifteen back. The Pophlanack Bodds—um—let me see—yes, they live about—eh ?" Here he appeals to his wife.

Mrs. Pendell supposes that the Pophlanack Bodds are distant from Penwiffle some fourteen or sixteen miles. Old Ruddock will have to drive twenty-four before he's finished the evening, but then he's a character, and to think of Old Ruddock walking, driving, or riding, is only a merry thought to Pendell, at all events, whatever the fact may be to Old Ruddock. The Tregonies of Tregivel will drive ten miles to dinner, and the Trelissacs have about nine and a-half to get over.

Another Note on Cornwall.—Hospitality and Sociability are eminently the marks of a country where such distances are no bar to frequent dinner parties, balls, private theatricals, and all sorts of genial foregatherings.

CHAPTER XLI.

TO BED—PROCESS—TAKING SOMETHING—A READING—TEMPUS FUGIT—ELEVEN P.M.—MORNING—A-HUNTING WE WILL GO—CERTAINTY OF RUDDOCK—BREAKFAST—PASTIES AND CIDER—ON OUR ROAD—CHILLY—TUMBLE-DOWN INN—SHIVERING SPORTSMEN—A JEST—RETROSPECTIVE OTTERS—SPEARS—INQUIRIES—NOTES—DANGERS OF OTTER-HUNTING—CROWD—THE FIELD—BY THE BANK—A MÊLÉE—SAFETY IN FLIGHT—OLD RUDDOCK—WHERE?

TALK over all these arrangements at dinner. Then, as we have, Pendell tells me, to be up early for otter-hunting, we determine upon going to bed early.

Process of Going to Bed Early.—Mrs. Pendell retires at nine, having seen that “everything we want” is left out on the sideboard. Pendell observes that he shan’t be half an hour at most before he’s up-stairs. I yawn, to show how tired I am, and corroborate his statement as to the time we intend to pass in front of the fire.

Mrs. Pendell has retired. Pendell wishes to know what I’ll take. Nothing, I thank him. Pendell doesn’t “think—um—that—he’ll—um—take anything,” and stands before a row of bottles with the critical air of a Commander-in-Chief reviewing the line. It almost looks as if he wanted a bottle to step out of the rank and invite him to make up his mind at once and take a drop of him. In order not to prevent him from enjoying himself, I sacrifice myself, and say, "Well, I'll have just the smallest glass of whiskey." Pendell is of opinion that no one can do better than whiskey, it being, he says, the most wholesome spirit.

We whiskey. The quarter-past arrives. We take no notice of it, except that Pendell remarks that that clock is about twelve minutes fast, in which case, of course, we have nearly half an hour at our disposal. Conversation commences. We somehow get upon Literature, especially upon the subject of my Analytical History of Motion. Pendell quotes a line from somewhere. We can't think where it is to be found.

This leads Pendell to the book-shelves. While he is up, would he mind just mixing me the least drop more whiskey—and water, plenty of water. He does so, and continues his search for the book, ending by bringing down the Ingoldsby Legends. "Do I remember this one?" he asks me. No, I have forgotten it. He thinks the line he quoted is there. He is, he says, going to give it at a Penny Reading, and has already done so with great success. He reads a few lines.

Flash.—Ask him to read. Nothing so pleasant as the sound of some one reading poetry when you're very tired, and are sitting before a good fire. Light a pipe as an aid to listening comfortably. Better than going to bed. Besides, if he reads, it's his fault that we don't go to bed early, as we told Mrs. Pendell we would.

He reads aloud. I interrupt him occasionally (opening my eyes to do so), just to show I am attending, and twice I dispute the propriety of his emphasis; but I don't sustain my side of the argument, from a feeling that to close my eyes and be droned to sleep, is preferable to straining every nerve in order to talk and to keep awake.

11 o'clock, P.M.—Pendell stops, and says, "Why, you're asleep!" I reply that he is mistaken (having, in fact, just been awoke by feeling as if a spring had given way at the nape of my neck), but I own, candidly, to feeling a little tired.

"Um!" says Pendell, and puts his selection for a Penny Reading away. Bed.

Morning.—Am aroused by Pendell, who is always fresh. "Lovely morning," he says, opening the curtains. [Note.—When you're only one quarter awake there's something peculiarly obtrusive in any remark about the beauty of the day. To a person comfortably in bed and wishing to remain there, the state of the weather is comparatively uninteresting, unless it's dismally foggy or thoroughly rainy, when, in either case, you can congratulate yourself upon your cleverness and forethought in not having got up.] "Is it?" I ask. Through the window I see only mist and drizzle.

"Just the morning for otter-hunting!" exclaims Pendell, enthusiastically. Then, as he's leaving the room, he turns, and says, "O, by the way, I've just remembered that Old Ruddock's pretty sure to be out with the hounds. He's great fun out hunting."

This stirs me into something like exertion. Otters and Ruddock. Ruddock, during a check, setting the field in a roar.

At Breakfast.—"Um," says Pendell, thinking over something as he cuts a ham, "we shan't want to take anything with us, because Old Penolver gives us lunch. He's a picture of an Old English Squire is Penolver. Quite a picture of a—um—yes——" here he apparently considers to himself whether he has given a correct definition of Penolver or not. He seems satisfied, and closes his account of him by repeating, "Yes—um—yes—an Old English Squire, you know—quite a character in his way," (I thought so,) "and you'll have pasties and cider."

"Pasties!" I exclaim. The word recalls Bluff King Hal's time, the jollifications—by my halidame!—gadso!—crushing a cup, and so forth. Now I have the picture before me (in my mind's eye) of the Old English Squire, attended by grooms bearing pasties and flagons, meeting the Otter Hunters with spears and dogs. Good! Excellent! I feel that My Health will be benefited by the air of the olden time. And perhaps by the pasties.

"Do any ladies come?" I ask.

"Safe to," answers Pendell, "last day of hunting—all the ladies out—sort of show meet, and lounge."

Pasties, flagons, dames, gallants with lutes, and pages with beakers of wine. I am all anxiety to start.

The Drive.—Bleak, misty, sharp, dreary. I am in summer costume of flannels, intending for running. Hope we shall have some running, as at present I'm blue with cold and shivering.

Six miles finished.—We get out at a tumble-down roadside inn. Three boys, each one lankier and colder-looking than the other, are standing together with their hands in their pockets, there being evidently among them a dearth of gloves. A rough man in a velveteen coat and leggings appears, carrying a sort of quarter-staff spiked. I connect him at once with otters. Pendell returns his salute. This is the Huntsman. The three chilly boys are the Field. We are all shivering, and evidently only half awake. Is this what Pendell calls a "show meet, and a lounge?"

for an otter hunt." The chilly boys hearing this, turn away, the man with the spear takes it literally and is offended, "because," he says, "we might ha' had a much worse day." Pendell says to himself, thoughtfully, "Um—colder—otter—lia! Yes, I see. I've made that myself lots of times." I thought that down here, perhaps, it wouldn't have been known. Never risk an old joke again. If I feel it's the only one I've got, preface it by saying, "Of course you've heard what the Attorney-General said the other day to (some one)?" and then, if on being told, they say, "O! that's very old," why it's not your fault.

A fly appears on the road with the Master. He welcomes Pendell and friend heartily and courteously. Is sorry that it is the last meet. Thinks it's a bad day, and in the most genial manner possible damps all my hopes of seeing an otter. "A few weeks ago," he says, "there were plenty of otters."

Flash.—To find out if that spearing-picture is correct. Show myself deeply interested in otters.

The Master says that spearing is unsportsmanlike. Damper number two. No spears. We walk on, and get a little warmer.

More "Field" meets us: some mounted.

Note on Otter-Hunting.—Better than fox-hunting, because you trust to your own legs. You can't be thrown, you can't be kicked off, or reared off; and, except you find yourself alone with the otter in a corner, there's no danger.

Note Number Two. Additional.—Yes, there is one other danger. A great one.

Here it is:—

We have been walking miles along the banks of a stream, crossing difficult stepping-stones, climbing over banks eight feet high [thank goodness, impossible for horses], with drops on the other side, and occasional jumpings down, which shake your teeth, but still you land on your own legs, and if you fall you haven't got a brute on the top of you, or rolling over you, or kicking out your brains with his hind hoofs. We number about sixty in the Field. The shaggy, rough hounds are working up-stream, swimming and trotting, and stopping to examine the surface of any boulder which strikes their noses as having been lately the temporary resting-place of an otter. A few people on horseback are proceeding, slowly in single file, along the bank. Difficult work for them. Ladies, too, are on foot, and all going along as pleasantly as possible. Suddenly a cry—a large dog is seen shaking his head wildly, and rubbing his front paws over his ears—another dog is rolling on the bank—another plunges into the river furiously, also shaking his head as if he was objecting to everything generally, and would rather drown than change his opinions.

Another cry.

Horses plunging—one almost in the river—shrieks of ladies—exclamations from pedestrians—the field is scattered—some attempt to ford the river—some jump right in—some on horseback cross it shouting—some plunge into the plantation on the left—some are running back upon us! A panic.

Mad bull, perhaps—if so—with admirable presence of mind I jump into the water up to my waist, and am making for the opposite side, when a man, running and smoking a short pipe answers my question as to the bull with—

“No! Wasps! Wasps’ nest!!” In a second I see them. At me. Pursuing me. I dive my head under water. Wet through! Scramble up bank. One wasp is after me. One pertinaciously. My foot catches in a root, I am down. Wasp down too, close at my ear. A minute more I am up. Wasp up too, by my right ear.

An Inspiration.—It flashes across me that wasps hate mud. Don't know where I heard it. Think it was in some child's educational book. No time for thinking. Jump—squish—into the mud! Over my knees—boots nearly off. The last thing I see of Pendell is holding on his spectacles with his left hand, and fighting a wasp with his stick in his right. Squish—flop—floss! . . . Up against a stump—down in a morass. Wasp at me. Close to my ear as if he wanted to tell me a secret. I won't hear it! Now I understand why the dog shook his head. Through a bramble bush (like the Man in the Nursery Rhyme, who scratched both his eyes out and in again by a similar operation), and come out torn and scratched, but dry as a pen after being dragged through a patent wiper of erect bristles. No wasp. Gone. I am free. But still I keep on.

That's the only great danger in Otter-Hunting. At least, that I know of at present.

I pick up the man with pipe. Kindest creature in the world. He has two pipes, and he fills and gives me one. He says, "Wasps won't attack a smoker."

Flash.—Smoke.

Pendell comes up. "Um!—aha!" he says; "narrow escape!" He has not been stung.

The Field is pulling itself together again. Pendell chuckles. "Did you see Old Ruddock?" he asks. "There were two wasps at him."

No! It appears that Old Ruddock has been quite close to me throughout the day. Yet there was no laughing crowd, and I haven't heard one of Ruddock's jokes bruited about. Odd. Wonder how the wasps liked Ruddock.

CHAPTER XLII.

THE FORTUNE AND MISFORTUNE OF SPORT — WHERE'S THE OTTER? — THE RUN — THE RESULT — BACK AGAIN — "NIGHT WI' RUDDOCK" — DISTANCE — PUNCTUALITY AND PLEASURE — COLLARS — STUDS — USUAL DIFFICULTIES — THE LAST MOMENT — HURRY-SCURRY — HEAT — EVERYBODY ARRIVED — DOWN AT LAST — AWKWARD — CORNISH BEAUTIES — RUDDOCK AT LAST — EXPECTATIONS — ANTICIPATIONS — PREPARATIONS.

LITTLE way further on we hear of an otter. A mile higher up the river we get on his trail. The hounds are working. Beautiful sight. Another mile, still on his trail. We tumble over hedges and ditches, we wade knee high through water, we squish through mud, and struggle through bogs. Another mile. More excitement. Further intelligence about the otter. Some one has seen him, yesterday night. He is quite sure that it was not a water-rat. Indeed, he is indignant about it. We trudge on for another mile. More wasps, more confusion. Safety reached in a meadow. Higher hedges, bruising knees, hands scratched; but Dogs still working. Pendell thinks we shall find the otter. The Master is silent and anxious, so is the Huntsman. Pendell shows me, from the manner of the Dogs, where the otter has certainly been. We walk seven miles and stop. No otter. Call off, and try somewhere else. From information received next day, it appears that while we were going up the stream the otter had gone down it, which accounts for our not having met him. Also we hear that within half a mile of the next place (where we failed again) a fine otter was seen comfortably asleep.

Home we return from otter-hunting. Tired, but expecting a "Nicht wi' Ruddock." He is to be at dinner, and a few very intimates are coming in the evening. The few "very intimates" have no distance to drive—merely a matter of eight miles or so.

From my window I hear carriages drawing up exactly at two minutes to seven o'clock. Punctuality in Cornwall is the soul of pleasure.

Odd : at the last moment I can't find either a collar or a white tie ! "Come, Desperation, lend thy furious hold !" Rummage in the drawers, in the portmanteau. Staggered. Where can it be?—the collar, I mean. Rummage again. Getting hot and excited. Ought always to come down to dinner calm, cool, and collected. I shall be the only one late, and I hadn't to come twelve miles to dinner. No excuse except the real one,— "Couldn't find my collars, or a tie." Only one thing for it. Ring the bell, and ask servant.

"O yes, Sir ! We were changing the drawers from this room to Master's. I dessay, Sir, they're in there." They are. Rapture !

Flash.—Stirring subject for operatic and descriptive music—A Gentleman's Toilet in Difficulties.

Next Difficulty.—Drop a stud suddenly. Hear it fall close by my foot. In fact, I feel, from some peculiar sensation in my foot, that it is here, on the floor, close to me. No. Hunt for it. Can't see it anywhere. [Mem.—Never travel without duplicate studs. Won't another time.] Still stooping: feeling about the carpet. Hands getting dirty again, hair coming unbrushed, face growing warm and red.

Flash.—The stud being, as it were, an excrescence on the carpet, can be perceived by lying on the floor, (like an Indian listening to hear if anybody's coming,) and directing your eye in a right line. After this, clothes-brush required. Stud found at last exactly where I thought it had been at first.

Another Difficulty.—Time getting on. 7.10. Pendell by this time anxious below. Every one arrived. I picture to myself Ruddock in the drawing-room, filling up the mauvais quart d'heure by satirical reflections on the dandy (me) who hadn't time enough to beautify himself for dinner.

I should be down now, if it wasn't for the button on my collar-band. I feel that it's all over with it, if not touched gently. Once off, and worry will be my portion for the remainder of the evening. And I know what is the result of attempting to pin it.

Last Difficulty, I hope.—After treating the button with suppressed emotion, dash at the white tie. I find myself asking myself, "Why the washerwoman will fold it all wrong, and starch it so that the slightest crinkle shows?" I have no answer. Of course at any other moment I could tie it at once, and have done with it; but now first one end's too long, then the other end's too short; then, on the third trial, the middle part somehow gets hopelessly tucked into itself, and I am pulling at it, by mistake, for one of the ends. At last I get it something like all right, but not everything that could be desired. Waistcoat. Coat. Handkerchief! Where's handkerchief? Where is— . . . ha! Down-stairs.

Everybody waiting, evidently. Apology. "Ah!" says Pendell, "um—ah—now you've come, we'll—um——" and rings the bell.

I recognise some of our companions out otter-hunting to-day. Galaxy, too, of Cornish beauty, which means the darkest, brightest eyes, and the clearest, freshest complexions. Not being introduced, I look about for Old Ruddock. There is an elderly gentleman sitting at a table looking over a photograph book. This is the nearest approach to Old Ruddock that I can see. Dinner announced. I take in Miss Bodd, of Pophlanack, and follow the Trelissacs, the Tregonies of Tregivel, and Major Penolver, with Mrs. Somebody of Somewhere. Whom Ruddock takes, I don't know.

A Discovery.—I am seated next to Old Ruddock of Ruddock, at dinner. Pendell introduces us. A hale, hearty, elderly gentleman, with, if any expression at all, rather a sleepy one, as if a very little over-feeding would send him into a doze.

Now then for a "Nicht wi' Ruddock!"

WE somehow turn the dinner conversation upon some peculiar way of cultivating mangel. Pendell looks at Old Ruddock, and, alluding to the last speaker's remark, whatever it was, says, "Aha! that isn't the way we grow mangel in the South, is it, Mr. Ruddock?" and therewith gives Old Ruddock such a humorous look, as if they had, between them, several good jokes about mangel, which, when told by Old Ruddock, would set the table in a roar.

I turn towards him with a propitiatory smile, as much as to say, "You see I'm ready for any of your funny stories." Old Ruddock glances up at me from his plate (he hasn't looked up much since the beginning of dinner), and replies, gravely and simply, "No." Whereat, Pendell almost roars with laughter, and nods at me knowingly, as if asking if Ruddock isn't a character. He may be. Perhaps it requires the wine to draw him out, but he hasn't, as yet, said anything funny or witty ; in fact, he hasn't said anything at all. The conversation, otherwise, is general and well distributed. Topics principally local.

As far as I am concerned, it is not unlike being suddenly given a bass part in a quintette, where the other four know their music off by heart. I speak from experience, remembering how, in the instance alluded to, I came in wherever I could, with very remarkable effect, and generally at least an octave too low, leaving off with the feeling that if we had been encored (of which there wasn't, under the circumstances, the slightest possible chance), I should have come out very strong, and quite in tune. As it was, I had first to find my voice, which seemed to have gone down like the mercury in a barometer on a cold day, and having succeeded in producing it, I had then to issue it in notes.

During dinner I am frequently brought into the conversation, apologetically, and appealed to out of politeness, as "probably not taking much interest in these matters."

The matters in question are usually something vexatious with regard to paupers, a political question deeply mixed up with the existence of the Yeomanry, the state of the roads in the next district, the queer temper of a neighbouring clergyman, the difficulty of dealing with Old Somebody at a vestry meeting, the right of some parish authorities to bury somebody who oughtn't, or ought, to have been buried without somebody else's consent ; the best mode of making a preserve, a difference of opinion as to varieties of cider, the probabilities of a marriage between Tresomeone of Tre-somewhere with Pol-somebody of Pol-something else, and so forth. On consideration, I am interested. For, to a reflective mind, is not all this the interior mechanism of the Great British Constitution? Of course. One thing I observe, viz., that people living three hundred miles from the great centre of English fashionable life, know as much, and often a great deal more about the Royal Academy, the notabilities of the season, the latest opera, the newest play, and all topics of more or less general interest, than do regular London habitués. Evidently one month of thorough London life in mid-season is equal to eight months of routine. Lands-enders are at home in London, but Londoners are nonplussed at Land's End. Ergo, live at Land's End.

The only thing that Old Ruddock says the whole time, is that he wouldn't keep Cochin China fowls even if they were given him.

"Wouldn't you?" exclaims Pendell, looking slyly at me and beginning to laugh, evidently in anticipation of some capital story, or a witticism from Ruddock. No, not another word. He is, it strikes me, reserving himself. I turn to my partner, and try to interest her in Ramsgate, Torquay, the Turkish bath, London and Paris news. She doesn't like Torquay, has never been to Ramsgate, and from what she has heard of it thinks it must be vulgar (to which I return, "O, dear no," but haven't got any proof that it isn't. I find out that she goes every season to London, and knows more about operas than I do, and finally was brought up in Paris, and generally stops there for a month yearly with her Aunt, so that I am unable to give her any information on my special subjects, and as she clearly wants to listen to some story which Tregony of Tregivel, on the other side of her, is telling, I feel that I'd better continue my dinner silently, or draw Ruddock out. I try it, but Ruddock won't come out. I remark therefore again to myself that Land's End has, in social and fashionable topics, at least six to four the best of London.

Dessert.—Tregony of Trevigel does come out genially, without the process of drawing. He has some capital Cornish stories, with an inimitable imitation of Cornish dialect.

Flash.—While he is telling a rather long anecdote to think of something good and new to cap it. Why not something with (also) an imitation of dialect, or brogue. I've got a very good thing about a Scotchman, but can't remember it in time.

Odd how stories slip away from you just at the moment you especially want to remember them. During a pause in the conversation I remember my story, and secure attention for it by suddenly asking Pendell (which startles him) if "he's ever heard," &c., and of course he, politely, hasn't. Odd. Somehow, this evening I can't recall the Scotch accent. I try a long speech (not usually belonging to the story) in Scotch, so as to work myself up to it, but, somehow or other, it will run into Irish. My story, therefore, takes somewhat this form. I say, "Then the Scotchman called out, 'Och, bedad'—I mean, 'Ye dinna ken'"—and so forth. Result, failure. But might tell it later, when I'm really in the humour, which I evidently am not now, and yet I thought I was. Everyone listened most politely. I can imagine what they said afterwards.

Old Ruddock begins to come out, not as a raconteur, but as an interrupter, which is a new phase of character.

For example, Tregony commences one of his best Cornish stories, to which we are all listening attentively, something about an uncle and a nephew, and a cart.

"They went," says Tregony, "to buy a cart"——

"A what?" says Ruddock, really giving his whole mind to it.

"A cart," answers Tregony.

"O," returns Ruddock, "I beg pardon. Yes, well"—

"Well," resumes Tregony, "they wanted something cheap, as they had no use for it except to get home,—"

"Get what?" asks Ruddock.

"Home," replies Tregony, evidently a bit nettled.

"Oh, ah! yes," returns Ruddock, apologetically. "Home—well?"

"Well," Tregony continues, looking towards his opposite neighbour, so as to avoid Old Ruddock if possible, "the landlord of the Inn says to them, 'I'll lend you and Nevvy Bill a cart——'"

Ruddock's in again with "A what?"

I can't help turning upon him, and saying, rather irritably, "A cart!" I feel inclined to add, "Do be quiet, and ask your questions afterwards. Then I say to Tregony, encouragingly, "Yes."

"'Only' (continues Tregony), says the Landlord, joking them, 'mind yew du bring the wheels back safe and sound.' So they promised, and that they went about the town till it was rather late and getting dark——"

"Getting what?" asks Old Ruddock, with his hand up to his ear. Everybody annoyed, and two persons besides myself repeat the word "dark" to him.

With these interruptions, and the consequent necessity of making it all quite clear, specially when it comes to Tregony imitating the conversation between Uncle and Nephew, in two voices, when Old Ruddock perpetually wants to know "Who said that," and so puzzles Tregony that sometimes he makes the Uncle take the Nephew's voice, and vice versa, and the story is getting into difficulties, when the servant enters with a message to our Host from Mrs. Pendell, which brings us to our feet, and into the drawing-room, Tregony promising me the story quietly in a corner. The humour of a well-told Cornish story is equal to anything Irish.

The other ladies have come. We all try to enter the drawing-room carelessly, as if the ladies weren't there, or as if we'd been engaged in some fearful conspiracy in the next room, and were hiding our consciousness of guilt under a mask of frivolity. Miss Bodd, of Pophthlanack, is alone at a table, turning over the pages of a photographic album. I join her.

Careful Flash.—Take care never to offer an opinion on photographic or any other sort of portraits, unless you're quite sure of your ground.

I remark generally that I don't care about photographic portraits. Before Miss Bodd can answer, I hear a rustle behind me, and a voice asks simply, "Why?"

Good gracious! It is—Miss Straithmere? She comes as it were like the statue-bride in Zampa (and she is in white) to claim me for her own. She is staying with the Clethers ["Mr. Clether is here," Pendell tells me. "He's written a work on the Moon. Quite a character—"], and as the Rev. Mr. Clether is the Rector of Poltrepen, she is not a mile from the house, and will be here every day.

Singing and playing. Miss Straithmere asks me, "Why I am so serious? Will I tell her. Do. Why?"

I expect Ruddock to sing. He doesn't. Mr. Clether is talking to him. I join them. I am anxious to hear what Mr. Clether's view of the Moon is. He replies, "O, nothing particular."

"But," I urge, Ruddock listening, "You have made a study of astronomy, and in these days"—I slip at this moment, because I don't know exactly what I was going to say; but I rather fancy it was that "In these days the moon isn't what it was."

Mr. Clether modestly repudiates knowing more about the moon than other people, and says that Pendell is right about his having written a book, but he has never published it.

"Why?" asks Miss Straithmere, joining us.

Why will she say Why? If she only wouldn't—if she only would be less the impulsive child of nature I might . . . but no . . . She says, in a reproachful tone, but quite loud enough to be heard by Miss Penolver, whose acquaintance I am anxious to make, and who now turns away, "You're angry with poor little me. Why? Do tell me why." Despairingly I reply, "No, I am not angry, but really —"

Carriages. Thank goodness.

I accompany Ruddock to the door. He has a gig, and a lantern, like a Guy Fawkes out for an airing.

I am still expecting a witticism, or rather a jeu de joie of humour and fun, like the last grand bouquet of fireworks that terminates the show at the Crystal Palace.

Pendell (who I believe is still drawing him out) says to him, "You'll have a fine night for your drive," then looks at me and laughs, as much as to say, "Now you'll hear him, now it's coming. He's shy before a party, but now——"

Ruddock replies from above, in his gig, "Yes, so it seems. Good-bye."

And away goes the vehicle, turns the corner, and disappears from view in the avenue.

Pendell chuckles to himself. "Quite a character," I hear him murmuring. Then, after a short laugh, he exclaims almost ordly, "Old Ruddock! ah! ah! Rum old fellow."

And so we go in. And this has been the long-expected "Nicht wi' Ruddock." He hasn't said twenty words. Certainly not one worth hearing. Yet Pendell seems perfectly satisfied with him, and years hence, I dare say, this occasion will be recounted as a night when Old Ruddock was at his best. After this, how about Sheridan?

Next morning.—My friend, Miss Straithmere, is coming at two o'clock. I find that I can leave, vid Launceston, at eleven. I am not well. I can't help it. I begin to consider, is it my nature to be ill? No, I must go up to town, and consult my Doctor.

Adieu, Penwiffle. Had I stopped, I feel that in the wilds of Cornwall, out at Tintagel, or at Land's End, or in a slate quarry, or down a mine, I should . . . Well, I don't know exactly what, but I should have to answer the question, "Why?"

Yes, good-bye for the present to Penwiffle! If anything could establish me in good health, it would be the hospitality, the geniality, and the fine air of Cornwall. Pendell apologises for the absence of the Otter, and, before I leave, a messenger comes up, in hot haste, to offer another day's sport to be arranged specially for me. I regret I cannot stay. Pendell regrets it. Mrs. Pendell regrets it too. Her care (she keeps the entire village in health and happiness) would do wonders for me, but I also fancy that she has an eye to a match between Miss Janie and myself. It may be only fancy, but every woman is at heart a match-maker, and, if I stay, I am lost. Je me sauve.

My present idea is to live in London, about two miles from the British Museum. Then I can walk there every morning, and work in the library at my Analytical History of Motion.

If the Doctor agrees with me, and if this plan agrees with me,

I shall continue it; if not, I must take to boxing, gymnastics, or other violent exercise.

* * * * *

The Doctor does agree with me. He advises me to try my own prescription. In a week's time to call on him again, and go on calling on him regularly every Monday.

* * * * *

I have taken lodgings three doors from my Doctor's house. I shall make no further notes, unless, at some future time, I commence a history of a British Constitution (my own). And so, for the present, I conclude, with a quotation from Shakspeare, who was, among other things, evidently a valetudinarian, and conclude these papers by saying,

“ The tenor of them doth but signify ”

“ My Health.”

"Nothing could be prettier than this diamond edition of the Poet."

Opinion of "THE SUN."
